Sir, the arguments of gentlemen upon the other side, through four speeches, have been this, "only this, and nothing more," that we put the State of Alabama into the hands of what they please to call "negroes," and exclude from the control of that State the disloyal white men of Alabama, if we admit the State under the constitution which is submitted to us; while now, at this late hour in the debate, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says he opposes the bill because he thinks our friends will not be able to hold the reins there, but that the State will go over into the hands of the rebels. Inasmuch as the Democrats on this floor are unanimous in their opinion regarding it, while the gentleman from Massachusetts is only one of a very few on this side of the House holding to his opinion, I am inclined to think that they are right and he is wrong, and that the question now before the House is whether we are in favor of confirming the power of the State of Alabama in the hands of loyal men, our friends and the friends of the Government, the friends of human liberty, human rights, and equality, or whether we are willing to give it over to the hands of the rebels.

The case of the State of Tennessee has been referred to in this debate. Who upon this floor doubts that if Tennessee had not been admitted as she was, if Tennessee had been kept out until this hour, she would have been in as bad a condition as the State of Alabama is to-day; that nothing saved the State of Tennessee to the Union cause but putting the control of that State into the hands of our friends there? The legislative and the executive power of the State, the power to make the laws to protect the Union men and the freedmen, and the executive power to enforce those laws, are all that has kept Tennessee loyal to the Union—all that keeps her so to-day. Every member upon this floor from that State will agree with me.

To reject Alabama now, after she has gone through this struggle and has given her seventy thousand loyal votes in favor of this constitution, to turn her back and say, "You shall go through this agony again," is only to encourage rebels, while you dishearten and discourage loyal men. It is only to make the struggle more fearful, to leave more corpses by the way, to have more men hung upon gibbets and lamp-posts, to have more murders committed in that State, which we might prevent by admitting the State, and getting the power and control into the hands of the loyal men there. Of this fact I am as firmly convinced as I am of my own existence. To refuse to admit Alabama is to perpetrate a great wrong, a wrong that will cry to Heaven against this Congress, if you intend ever to admit those States.

I say to gentlemen that things cannot drift along in this way forever. Those States must be admitted some time. There must be an end of the confusion, the anarchy now prevailing. We must have civil law and civil order. We cannot always control those States by the bayonet. Our friends in Alabama have formed this constitution. The only complaint I have heard against it is that it secures equal civil and political rights to all the loyal men of that State. That is the only objection we hear from the other side of the House. In favor of this constitution more than seventy thousand votes have been polled, while only one thousand have been polled against it. The constitution has obtained within eight thousand of one half the registered vote of the State; and we show by incontestible proof that a larger number than eight thousand tried unsuccessfully to poll their votes, while many others actually voted, but their votes were destroyed. Yet gentlemen on this side of the House (and I am surprised to see it) ask that we shall turn them back, deny them admission when they knock at the doors of Congress.

In pursuance of the constitution thus voted upon the loyal men of that State have elected a loyal Legislature—entirely loyal. Every member of it is a loyal man. The entire Legislature is in the hands of the Republicans; and when I say that everybody understands that it is in the hands of loyal men. They have elected a Republican Governor and Lieutenant Governor, and all the State and county officers are Republicans. And who doubts their loyalty? As soon as you clothe them with the powers and functions of the State they will have the entire legislative, judicial, and executive power of that State in their hands. If the State of Alabama could poll seventy thousand votes in favor of this constitution under the circumstances attending that election, how many votes can be polled when the loyal men control all the offices? If they could poll seventy thousand when the offices were all in the hands of the rebels, when the voters were turned out of employment for voting, kicked out of their cabins, waylaid and assaulted, hustled by violence away from the polls, threatened with all kinds of ostracism and persecution, who doubts that they could poll one hundred thousand when they have the control of the offices, and the power of State is in their hands?

Mr. MYERS. In furtherance of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has stated I ask to read the following original letter sent in January, 1866, to Captain Francis Lyons, a gallant soldier who had just been honorably discharged from our service, notifying him to quit the State. It is addressed "To the traitor, Francis Lyons, late commanding Florida renegades:"

MOBILE, ALABAMA, January 28, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, citizens of Mobile, Alabama, give you one week from date to leave the place, and if found within the limits of the city or State after the time specified as above you and your traitorous offspring will be wiped into eternity as sure as there is a God above you.

By order of special committee, Mobile, Alabama.

Captain Lyons remained, and a few months later was brutally murdered almost in sight of his wife, a lady now living in my district, who in vain applies for a pension. This was when Andrew Johnson began to inspire rebels with fresh courage, the whole power of the State being placed by him in the hands of men who are unfriendly to loyalty. That power will now be given to loyal men, and those who fought for or sympathize with the Union can find protection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have letter upon letter from Alabama praying, begging, and beseeching Congress not to turn its back upon them and make them go through the cruel agony of another election. They ask to be spared the mortification, humiliation, and insults, to be spared the repeated publication of the black list deprived of employment and driven from their homes. They ask to be admitted now. Gentlemen say it is a violation of law to admit the State. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for whose opinions I always entertain a very high respect, says, as I understood him, that if we admit Alabama under this constitution we violate the enabling act.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I made no such intimation.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the gentleman has mistaken himself.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt of our power to do it in good faith.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman used the word "violation." I have no doubt, however, and so thought at the time, that he did not intend it. Of course, it is not a violation of the enabling act. The same Congress that passed the enabling act has the right to pass another, repealing as much of the former act as it deems proper, and at most it is but a repeal. But I hold that this is neither a violation nor a repeal; for what means the provision in that enabling act which says that "if Congress shall be satisfied that a majority of the registered voters were in favor of the constitution?" If we "are satisfied"—what does that mean? It certainly does not mean that we shall be satisfied of the fact that a majority of them voted for it, for this is a provision in addition. The intention of that law was to give to Congress entire supervision and control of the matter. The chief object was to protect loyal men and prevent rebels in the minority, by fraud and violence, from forcing or palming upon the people a constitution against their wishes.

As I said when I reported this bill, according to the argument of some gentlemen here, if eight thousand rebels or eight thousand copperheads or Democrats or what not had come out and voted against the constitution we would be bound under this law to admit the State. Is not this preposterous—that because eight thousand or ten thousand did not vote against it we should refuse to admit it, while, if they had voted against it, we should be bound under the law to admit it?

But, Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House as long as I desire at this late hour.

The SPEAKER stated that the vote would be first taken on the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM; next on that of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania; next on that of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio; and then on that of Mr. SPALDING.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire, whenever it shall be in order, to submit a motion to recommit the bill and amendments to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. That will not be in order; the previous question operating prevents its being made.

Mr. BROOKS. I refer to page 190 of the Manual, paragraph 124.

"After commitment and report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted."

The SPEAKER. The point of order would be sustained if the previous question did not operate. By referring to page 132 of the Digest it will be seen that—

"When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but (1) to adjourn, (2) to lie on the table, (3) for the previous question, (4) to postpone to a day certain, (5) to commit or amend, (6) to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged."

The motion for the previous question, of course, takes precedence of the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read the bill and the various amendments.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 30, nays 103, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Beck, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Fox, Glessbrenner, Golladay, Haight, Holman, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, Munger, Niblack, Nicholson, Pruyn, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Woodward—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gravelly, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koonz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Patne, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polsey, Pomerooy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Walker, James F. Wilson, John P. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—103.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Blair, Boyer, Butler, Calkins, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cornell, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Finney, Garfield, Getz, Griswold, Grover, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Kelley, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Phelps, Pike, Randall, Robinson, Schenck, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and Wood—56.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER stated that his colleague, Mr. GETZ, had paired with Mr. CAKE.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM, to strike out the third section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That said State of Alabama shall be entitled to representation in Congress and recognized as a State of the Union upon the following conditions: that the constitution of Alabama shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen, or any class of citizens, of the United States of the right to vote, who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized; nor so amended or changed as to allow any person to vote who is excluded from office by the third section of the fourth article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, until the disabilities imposed by said sections shall have been removed in the manner therein provided; and Congress shall have power to annul any amendment to the constitution of Alabama, or any act of the Legislature of said State, contrary to the provisions of this section.

The question being put on striking out the foregoing section, there were—yeas 71, nays 39.

Mr. ARNELL demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. WARD demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment striking out the section was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, to strike out all after the first section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State of Alabama shall be recognized and admitted into the Union upon the following fundamental condition: that the right of suffrage of male citizens of the United States, and of said State of Alabama, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, shall never be denied or abridged in said State on any account except for treason, felony, or other crime, infamous at common law; but suffrage, as above provided for, shall forever be universal and impartial, and Congress shall have power to annul any act of said State in violation or derogation of this act with regard to suffrage, and may regulate the same in case of such alteration. If the right of suffrage in the State of Alabama should ever be reduced below the universal right herein provided for, all legislation admitting said State into the Union shall be null and void.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The next question was on the following amendment offered by Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, to the substitute proposed by Mr. SPALDING:

Strike out all of the substitute and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama, so far as the same is not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And all State, county, and municipal officers elected at said election shall, on the 1st day of May, 1868, or as soon thereafter as possible, qualify as provided in said constitution and the ordinances of said convention, and immediately thereafter enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor at any time after he shall have qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, may by proclamation convene the Legislature chosen at said election. The Legislature, when so convened, shall possess all the power conferred by said constitution which may not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the Legislature is hereby further empowered to submit said constitution to the electors of Alabama qualified to vote under said constitution, for their ratification or rejection at such time or times as it may designate. And said Legislature is also required to submit with the said constitution the "article" proposed in the fifth section of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, shall have ratified said constitution submitted as aforesaid, together with the article proposed in the fifth section, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district commanders shall furnish all necessary aid in enforcing this act, and the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof, shall remain in full force except as modified by this act, until Alabama shall be restored to representation in Congress.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the State of Alabama shall be entitled to resume its constitutional relations with the national Government upon the fundamental condition that the following articles shall be adopted and made a part of the constitution of said State, which shall be forever irrevocable without the consent of the Congress of the United States:

This constitution shall never be so altered or amended as to operate as a denial or abridgment of the elective franchise to any citizen of the United States qualified to vote under this constitution, and no amendment of said constitution shall hereafter be valid until the same shall be ratified by a majority of the qualified electors of this State, and shall have been approved by the Congress of the United States.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

The next question was upon the substitute offered by Mr. SPALDING, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama, so far as the same is not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the officers elected at said election shall, on the 1st day of May, 1868, qualify as provided in said constitution and the ordinances of said convention, and immediately thereafter enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor at any time after he shall have qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, may by proclamation convene the Legislature chosen at said election. The Legislature, when so convened, shall possess all the power conferred by said constitution, which may not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the Legislature is hereby further empowered to submit said constitution to the qualified electors of Alabama for ratification at such time or times as it may designate. And said Legislature is also empowered, by a majority vote of each House, to submit the said constitution, as framed by the convention, with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature. And if amendments be proposed by the Legislature, they shall be voted upon separately, and not in connection with the constitution as it came from the convention.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, qualified under the act of Congress of March 23, 1867, to vote for delegates to frame a constitution, and actually voting upon such ratification, shall have ratified a constitution submitted as aforesaid, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district commanders shall furnish all necessary aid in enforcing this act, and the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof shall remain in full force in Alabama except as modified by this act, until Alabama shall be restored to representation in Congress.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was then put on ordering the preamble to be engrossed, and it was decided in the negative.

So the preamble was rejected.

Mr. NIBLACK. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The engrossment of the bill is not quite completed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there are no other bills or resolutions, as there do not appear to be, I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, providing for appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 164) to provide for appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to add to section one the words, "under the limitations now provided by law for other cases of appeal from said court;" so as to make the section read:

That an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be allowed on behalf of the United States from all the final judgments of the said Court of Claims adverse to the United States, whether such judgments shall have been rendered by virtue of the general or any special power or jurisdiction of said court under the limitations now provided by law for other cases of appeal from said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no judgment of the Court of Claims upon any claim or demand for, or in respect to, any captured or abandoned property, or any property seized or taken as captured or abandoned property, shall be paid in any wise, or from any money or fund, until such payment shall be ordered by act of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said Court of Claims, at any time while any suit or claim is pending before or on appeal from said court, or within two years next after the final disposition of any such suit or claim, may, on motion on behalf of the United States, grant a new trial in any such suit or claim and stay the payment of any judgment thereon, upon such evidence (although the same may be cumulative or other) as shall reasonably satisfy said court that any fraud, wrong, or injustice in the premises has been done to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be material in any suit or claim before any court to ascertain whether any person did or did not give any aid or comfort to the late rebellion, the claimant or party asserting the loyalty of any such person to the United States during such rebellion shall be required to prove affirmatively that such person did, during said rebellion, consistently adhere to the United States, and did give no aid or comfort to persons engaged in said rebellion; and the voluntary residence of any such person in any place where, at any time during such residence, the rebel forces or organization held sway shall be prima facie evidence that such person did give aid and comfort to said rebellion and to the persons engaged therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no plaintiff or claimant, or any person from or through whom any such plaintiff or claimant derives his alleged title, claim, or right against the United States, or any person interested in any such title, claim, or right, shall be a competent witness in the Court of Claims in supporting any such title, claim, or right, and no testimony given by such plaintiff, claimant, or person shall be used: Provided, That the United States shall, if they see cause, have the right to examine such plaintiff, claimant, or person as a witness.

Mr. FERRY. I certainly hope this amendment will not prevail. It raises again the disqualification of interest, which disqualification in the courts of most of the States has been abolished, and its abolition has worked well, so far as I know, both in this country and in England. The only effect of continuing the disqualification in the Court of Claims would be to exclude information which ought to be before that court. The interest of a party, according to the now well-understood principle in the administration of justice, goes simply to his credibility.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is true this section restores the law to the position in which it stood until within a year or two, when there was incorporated into the end of some appropriation or other bill a little proviso that permitted claimants in the Court of Claims to testify there, if not having been the law before; and it is understood that that proviso was intended to enable a claimant in a particular case—though that perhaps it is not proper I should mention, as it is not yet disposed of—to testify. It has been found by experience in that court, as might well be expected, that the principles upon which that court proceeds, the nature of the cases that come before it, the fact that there is no personal defendant who has personal knowledge himself of the transactions, make the will of evidence in this respect in that court properly different from that which usually prevails. It is true in Connecticut and in the State of Vermont and in many other States now that parties and persons in interest are permitted to testify; but whenever they are, they are confronted by an opposing party who has himself a personal interest in opposition to the claimant or to the witness, who can cross-examine him upon his personal knowledge of the transactions testified to, and who can himself take the stand to rebut, explain, or contradict that which has been stated by the interested party or witness.

Cases in the Court of Claims, from the very nature of things, cannot be conducted in that way. The United States is the defendant, having no personality, having nobody representing it who can have a personal knowledge upon which to proceed, and depending upon its agents, scattered wherever they may happen to be, for the proof or explanations which shall be necessary to meet the statements of those interested witnesses. It has been found, therefore, that the rule which has permitted now for a year or two persons in interest and claimants to testify has operated injuriously to the just interests of the United States; and it operates as an inducement to persons to bring forward fraudulent or unfounded claims, depending upon their testimony alone, particularly relating to affairs arising during the recent war, when the quartermasters or the commissaries or the Government officers or agents with whom they dealt have passed away, many of them killed in battle, or dying from disease—to bring forward, as I have said, claims that have no just foundation. It therefore appeared clear to the committee that, for the time being at least, situated as these matters are, it was highly necessary to return to the principle that has guided us until a very recent period. We thought that this amendment ought to be adopted for this reason. I hope it will commend itself to the good sense of the Senate.

I wish to move to amend the amendment, however, before a vote is taken upon it, in order to limit the operation of it a little. The amendment is this: to add at the end of the section, after the word "witness," these words:

Under the regulations and with the privileges provided in section eight of the act passed March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved February 24, 1855."

Mr. CONNESS. Why not let it lie over first?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will in a minute. I want to explain it. The effect of that amendment will be to make the testimony of a claimant or party in interest hereafter stand in the nature of a discovery, to entitle the United States, if the purposes of justice require it, to examine him under the same principles that a party at common law may be examined upon a bill of discovery, and to use his testimony if they shall desire it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. FERRY. I want to ask a question. Is it intended to press this bill to its passage to-day?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was going to dispose of that by asking the Senator from Vermont to lay this bill aside, as it will take some time, and it is very desirable to dispose of the subject that we had under consideration on Saturday, the case of Mr. Butler, of the House of Representatives. I move to lay this aside and proceed to the consideration of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will permit me to have a vote taken on this amendment to the amendment, so as to perfect the section before it is laid aside, I shall then have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment proposing to insert words as the fourth section it is moved to add "under the regulations and with the privileges provided in section eight of the act passed March 3, 1863, entitled 'An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States,' approved February 24, 1855."

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to vote intelligently on these amendments. I do not understand at all what the effect of this is. Reference is made to an act not before me, and which I have no opportunity to understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I just stated, but I will repeat to my friend from New York—

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will allow me to suggest that he did state something just now; but, like very much that is stated in that part of the House, it is entirely inaudible to everybody sitting here, and it might as well not have been stated, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect is to permit a claimant to be examined on behalf of the United States, if the officers of the United States shall desire, in the nature of a bill of discovery. They may take his testimony under an order of the court, and then use it or not, as you can use testimony obtained in answer to a pure bill of discovery in equity. The effect of this amendment is to put it under the same limitations provided in the act of 1863.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF R. R. BUTLER.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move to proceed with the consideration of House bill No. 870.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BUCKALEW to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, a man named R. R. Butler is a claimant for membership in the House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee. The obstacle he encounters to obtaining his seat there is the oath act of July 2, 1862; for it appears that he cannot conscientiously swear that he did not yield aid, comfort, and assistance to the late rebellion against the United States. We have before us a bill to relieve him from the political disabilities under which he labors, imposed by our laws; in other words, we are asked to dispense in his case with the oath act of 1862, with the provision of the fourteenth constitutional amendment—if indeed it be a part of the Constitution—which disqualifies him and persons like him from certain political privileges, and also to relieve him from all the disabilities created or imposed by what are known as the reconstruction laws. Now, sir, is this man a proper object for congressional indulgence? Ought we to interpose in his case and suspend in his favor the existing laws?

Mr. President, one thing very remarkable appears in this bill upon the first glance we bestow upon it, which is that this man is to be relieved from the disabilities of the reconstruction laws when those reconstruction laws have no application whatever to him, and no application whatever to his State. We may stand somewhat surprised before this bill when we come to contemplate this singular fact. Why does the House of Representatives send us a bill to remove disabilities which do not apply to this man or to his State? I suppose it was a simple blunder, the result of a careless investigation of the case. Yet, sir, I do not see that the Senate is bound to make itself ridiculous because this measure has already passed the House of Representatives; because there has been an oversight or an error there in forming the bill or in passing it. Your reconstruction law of the 2d of March, 1867, applied to the ten unrepresented States of the South and named them; the supplement of the 23d of March also applied only to those States; and the second supplement of the 19th of July had a similar application; very carefully in all those laws their provisions were confined to the ten States unrepresented in Congress, commencing with Virginia and ending with Arkansas.

Tennessee, it will be remembered, had been readmitted to representation in Congress some time before those reconstruction laws were passed. Consequently, when we came to enact them the State of Tennessee and all her people stood upon the same footing, so far as reconstruction was concerned and so far as representation in Congress was concerned, as the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania or as the people of those States stood. Yet, sir, we have the remarkable spectacle here of a bill from the House for which our votes are asked, which attempts to remove political disabilities imposed by the reconstruction laws from a citizen of Tennessee. I take it for granted that the Senate will not pass the bill with that absurd provision contained in it. It will not commit so foolish an act as that would be. The bill will require amendment in some way, and I suppose the simplest form it could assume to secure the purpose in view in proposing it, would be that it should provide that the oath of 1862 need not be taken by this applicant; that he may take that oath in some modified form. The bill put in that shape would be sensible, and, I suppose, would strike directly at the object intended by its authors.

But, Mr. President, ought this man to be relieved? Ought you to withdraw in his case the requirement of the oath-of-office act of July 2, 1862? I propose to show that he has no special merit; that he has no strong claim on our indulgence or favor, and that if we should retain sternly the provisions of that act in any case and apply them in any case, this is the very one or one of the very cases in which it should be retained and applied.

This claimant called an interesting witness and had him examined preparatory to the contest in the House of Representatives on the question of his seat. This witness was Rev. Lewis Venable. He was sworn and examined in Johnson county, Tennessee, on the 24th December, 1867. He testifies as follows concerning Mr. Butler. He says:

"My opportunities for knowing his sentiments are as follows: we were both Clay whigs and of the same religious sentiments; consequently our political and religious sentiments ran together." (Page 41 of evidence.)

From page 63 of the same volume of the evidence in this case (published by the House) I will read a couple of passages, which will, perhaps, show more fully the religious and political position of this applicant as defined by his own witnesses and by his own questions submitted to them.

Stephen Mathews, a witness being under examination, the claimant asks him this question:

"If" * * * "I did not state to you that I wished not only the bridges had been burned, but the damned road had been torn up from one end to the other?"

Again, he asked the same witness, being his own—

"Please state if, during the fighting at Fort Donelson, I did not say that General Buell would come to Nashville, and I hoped that he would blow the damned 'rebel hole' to hell, and not leave one stone upon another."

This is a question asked by this claimant himself of his own witness, citing his own words on a former occasion with reference to the utter destruction and demolition of a great city, the capital of his own State, in which there were many thousands of loyal and innocent persons then as there are now. The witness responds to the latter question, virtually affirming that that language was used to him. Again, at page 64, appears an answer of the same witness with reference to some sword presentation:

"In our conversations"—that is, between Butler and himself—

"Upon the subject of the sword, Judge Butler and myself agreed that if the sword was to cut the damned rascal's throat we would both sign our names to the list to help furnish it."

He calls Rev. Lewis Venable, who swears that their religious sentiments and political opinions are precisely alike. I have read from other parts of the testimony as produced and shaped by himself, to show you by way of illustration somewhat of his moral status as an applicant for admission to Congress; and also, sir, for another purpose, as preparatory to my submission of facts with reference to his political career since the commencement of the rebellion.

I will now read from pages 51 and 52 of the evidence. Observe, Mr. President, what I am reading is from the testimony of this applicant himself; the testimony taken by him in his own behalf, and not from testimony taken against him or in hostility to him. La Fayette Jones, a witness is under examination, and Mr. Butler asks him the following question and receives the following answer:

"Question. Please state if Johnson county, where said R. R. Butler resided, was not infested by a rebel company of home guards, commanded by William K. Waugh, and if you, while in the United States Army, was not ordered to come to said county, and while in said county if it did not become necessary to kill said Captain Waugh, and if you did not kill him, and what took place between you and said Butler relative to said killing.

Answer. Johnson county, where said Butler resides, was infested by a rebel company of home guards, commanded by William K. Waugh, and while belonging to the United States Army I was ordered to come into said county; and while there it became necessary to kill said Captain Waugh; and I did kill said Captain Waugh; and after I returned to the Federal army I told said Butler that I had killed said Captain Waugh; he told me I had done the best thing I ever did in my life, and told me to go to the store in Knoxville and help myself to the finest pair of boots in the store, and I did so.

Further deponent saith not.

LA FAYETTE JONES.

The mode and manner in which this life was taken, for which a reward was given afterward by the applicant is not stated, but the fair presumption, from the language used and the description of the witness is, that it was an assassination, that it was an irregular and unlawful taking of human life, not in any recognized mode of warfare, but according to that violent, irregular, cruel, I might say detestable, mode in which diabolical passion sometimes manifests itself in border warfare. Deliberately after the thing was done this applicant rewarded the person who committed the act by a present of a fine pair of boots, and he himself calls a witness and puts upon the record the proof of that fact in this case, apparently oblivious to the opinion which all mankind must form, if not express, upon such a transaction.

But that is not all. I pass to another case, produced also by himself in the evidence taken by him. Captain Daniel Ellis is under examination, and this is the question put to him on behalf of Butler, with his answer.

"Question. You say in your book (page 289) that Samuel McQueen, Greene Moore, and other rebels of Johnson county, had entered into a conspiracy to kill all the Union men of Johnson county and burn their houses. Please state if R. R. Butler did not come to you at Knoxville and agree, if you would go through the rebel lines and go to Johnson county and kill said McQueen, that he would make you a present of a fine military suit, and if you did not agree so to do?"

Answer. He did agree, if I would go through and kill McQueen, he would give me a suit of military clothes; I did go through the rebel lines and made the effort, but failed.

The excuse in this case for this attempted exercise possibly of private vengeance was that this man McQueen and several others had united together to kill all the Union men and destroy all the Union property in Johnson county. That that is a mere pretext as an excuse for this act is manifest from other parts of the evidence, to which I will refer. At page 27 Jacob H. Norris testifies as follows—he is a witness also for Mr. Butler:

"Question. Please state if Johnson county, it being the county where R. R. Butler resides, was not one of the most loyal counties in Tennessee?"

Answer. Johnson county, where R. R. Butler resides, was considered one of the most loyal counties in the State of Tennessee to the Federal Government, casting only about 73 votes for secession."

At page 58 appears the following in the testimony of Hamilton C. Smith, another witness for Mr. Butler. He says:

"He, Butler, was elected"—

This was in 1861, to the rebel legislature—

"He, Butler, was elected, receiving the largest majority of votes over his opponent that any one man ever did receive in the two counties; the balloting was strictly upon party issues: the strictly Union men of the two counties voted for Butler and the rebels voted for Rhea."

It appears afterward that the secession vote was utterly insignificant.

In view of these facts, with regard to Johnson county, this excuse, that McQueen and several other persons had entered into a conspiracy to kill all the Union men in that county and destroy all their property, is perfectly absurd. If this story were located somewhere else, where the Union men were weak, there might be some show of probability in a statement of that kind. It is obvious, however, that this is a mere pretext; and the presumption is that some other motive than a public or patriotic one actuated this attempt to procure the private assassination of an individual in that county. It looks to me, from the face of it, very much like a transaction for private vengeance, for glutting private animosity. Certainly there was no necessity at that time for any such action in that county, above all other counties in Tennessee, where the Union men were in an overwhelming majority, where nearly the entire population were or had been Union men, one where such a nefarious conspiracy as this could not be carried into execution unless backed by a military force, which it does not appear was there at the time.

I say, then, that upon the face of this record this claimant, to make out a case for himself, proceeds to prove against himself acts which stamp his character more darkly and strongly than mere words from me could do it; and I leave him, so far as that point is concerned, upon this exhibition of the record.

It is said that this man, in the latter part of the war, held a military command in the Federal Army and rendered important service. When you come to look into the record you find that he came into the Union lines and was concerned in raising a company of volunteers in East Tennessee at a particular time in the war when his conduct is easily explained, and that not upon the hypothesis of patriotism. But, sir, upon one of the witnesses, John M. Sawyers, (who was in the Army and knew the facts,) being asked a question about Butler's military service, he says, on page 5:

"The first I ever saw of him, Butler, was at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, and he was there ordered to Nashville, Tennessee, with his command, and resigned shortly after he arrived at Nashville, Tennessee. I know of no battles in which he and his command were engaged while he was in the Federal service."

It was a nominal command, which he resigned without having performed any service, and it was taken by him at a time and under circumstances to which I will refer hereafter.

Now, sir, let us come to the record of this man with regard to loyalty prior to the time when he was concerned with a military organization on our side, and commenced receiving pay out of our Treasury as a converted rebel, or as a man who under particular circumstances chose to take part with us in the struggle. At page 12 of the evidence appears this statement by Henry T. Wilber, a witness. He says:

"I was with Butler in Knoxville, and he asked me to give him all the influence I had to procure him office under the confederate government."

In the previous part of his testimony he fixes the date as in the fall of 1862. At that time it appears that this applicant was seeking office or place in the confederate service.

In August, 1861, Mr. Butler was elected to the rebel legislature of Tennessee. The State had seceded previously; I think about the month of June. In August an election was held, and he was chosen as a representative from Johnson and Carter counties, composing a representative district. He went to Nashville and took his seat in the rebel legislature, and served there for some three or four months, until the attack upon Fort Donelson and the fall of that place, when in consternation the legislature adjourned and subsequently met at Memphis. By tracing the journal and the laws passed it seems, however, that Butler was present in the month of March following, and was then found voting upon bills in hostility to us and in aid of the rebellion. In the course of that year, however, our fortunes brightening in that part of the country, Butler changed his side and came over to the Union lines, and was engaged in raising troops, as I have already stated.

Now, I propose to prove these facts. I have extracts from the journal of the rebel legislature of Tennessee of 1861 and 1862, which I will read:

"The general assembly of the State of Tennessee, begun and held in the city of Knoxville, State of Tennessee, on Monday, the 7th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1861, &c."

"The following gentlemen appeared, presented their credentials, and took their seats, the oath to support the constitution of the confederate States of America and of the State of Tennessee being administered by Hon. William R. Turner."

Among the members appears "from the counties of Carter and Johnson, R. R. Butler." He took his seat there, and was sworn to the confederate cause. On the 14th of December, 1861, Mr. Butler votes for the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this general assembly that the separation of those States now forming the confederate States of America from the United States is, and ought to be, final, perpetual, and irrevocable; and that Tennessee will, under no circumstances, entertain any proposition from any quarter which may have for its object a restoration or reconstruction of the late Union on any terms or conditions whatever.

Resolved, That the war which the United States are waging against the confederate States should be resisted with the utmost vigor and energy, and until our independence and nationality are unconditionally acknowledged by the United States.

Resolved, That Tennessee pledges herself to herself and to her sister States of the confederacy that she will stand by them throughout the struggle; that she will contribute all the means which her resources will supply, so far as may be necessary, to the support of the common cause, and will not consent to lay down arms until peace is established on the basis of the foregoing resolutions."

These resolutions were adopted by yeas 42, nays 19, as a substitute for other resolutions which had been proposed in the other branch of the Legislature, Mr. Butler being in the affirmative, and there being 19 negative votes. Then the resolutions, as thus amended by the substitution of these resolutions for others, were adopted—yeas 54, nays 3—Butler voting in the affirmative. On page 21 of this report of evidence appears a resolution by Mr. Ellis, an extract from which I will read:

"That any one who would, in this hour of danger to the country, in violation of that potential voice which has been spoken by the people of Tennessee, attempt to get up dissensions and internal strife, and thereby insidiously seek to draw any portion of the people into the clutches of the Lincoln despotism, should be regarded as a traitor and avoided as an enemy who would sacrifice our best interests upon the altar of his unholy ambition. We would therefore earnestly appeal to our respective constituencies throughout the State to discard minor differences of opinion which may have existed in reference to the old political parties, or touching the great revolution through which we are passing, and for the future stand as one man in support of the confederate government and against our common enemy, who, in violation of the sacred right of self-government, would, if possible, subjugate our people and desolate our homes."

On the 11th of November that resolution was read and adopted, there being no vote against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if Mr. Butler voted for that resolution?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I stated that the resolution was adopted by the Legislature, no division taking place.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. Butler had nothing to do with it, so far as the record goes, except being a member of the Legislature.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly, that is all I said. The presumption is that he was in its favor, as there was no division. Then, sir, on the 19th of October, another resolution was passed without a division, which read as follows:

"Whereas the counties of Overton, Fentress, and Jackson are threatened with invasion by the Lincoln forces of Kentucky: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the Governor be authorized and requested to accept and have mustered into the service forthwith, and armed and equipped, the cavalry company from Overton county known as the Brown Rangers."

The resolution was adopted without a division, and on motion of Mr. Donaldson its transmission to the Senate was ordered.

Here is a bill somewhat more remarkable than the resolutions to which I have referred. On the 9th of October, 1861—

"Mr. Osborne introduced House resolution No. 6, being entitled 'An act to amend an act passed June 25, 1861, entitled 'An act to raise and equip a provisional force and for other purposes'—"

A title very much like our military and conscription laws North—

"Which was read a first time, and passed to a second reading."

On the 11th of October this bill passed a second reading—yeas 53, nays 13. Among the yeas is recorded the name of Mr. Butler. The third reading was had on the 12th of October, and was carried by a vote of yeas 61, nays 5, Mr. Butler's name being again in the affirmative. On both of those readings there were men in the Legislature who voted nay, who went upon the record against the organization of a military force to resist the Federal arms, a military force to destroy the lives of our officers and soldiers that by extraordinary exertions and sacrifices we were raising and sending into that part of the country to vindicate our laws and maintain our jurisdiction. Upon the second reading there were no less than thirteen votes against that bill for perfecting a military organization of the State, and upon the final vote there were also men recorded in the negative; but this applicant for membership in the House of Representatives put himself on the record in the affirmative on both occasions, and defined his position beyond all cavil or question.

Now, sir, I have here that law which was thus enacted. It is chapter twenty of the laws of that year of the public acts of the State of Tennessee, page 20, entitled:

"An act to amend an act to raise, organize, and equip a provisional force, and for other purposes."

It is a long, elaborate military bill of nineteen sections to aid the confederate government; to raise the military and pecuniary resources necessary to invigorate the confederate arms and resist us in the struggle; and this man is upon the record solemnly upon two occasions on the yeas and nays in favor of its enactment, even when there were other members of the Legislature who voted against it.

I give way at this point to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to enable him to make a report.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the manufactures bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he expects action on that report now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will it not give rise to debate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know; but I desire action immediately. I wish to state that I hope it will not give rise to debate because I think there is nothing in it to which any one will object. I further desire to state that by the ordinary rules, not imperative, this report ought first to go to the House of Representatives; but in the peculiar circumstances by which we are surrounded, in view of the necessity of passing the measure before Wednesday, we were induced on examining the rules to report to the Senate first. There is no imperative rule on the subject, only a practice that has grown up to report first to the House that asked the conference. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should make no objection, but the Senator sees there are but about twenty minutes between this and the time when we shall proceed to other business.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the report is read and debate arises it will go over; but I certainly will not debate it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That necessarily postpones the bill we have under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. You cannot get a vote on that now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

The Secretary read the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the third amendment of the Senate and agree to the said Senate amendment, with an amendment, as follows: Insert in lieu of said Senate amendment, after the enacting clause, the words: That after the 1st day of June next no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation; nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence in writing to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the tax had been paid, and that such articles of manufacture were prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such drawback, or for any drawback of internal tax on exportations made prior to the passage of this act, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the 1st day of October, 1868, and the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their amendments to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Insert in lieu of said Senate amendment:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation who shall manufacture by hand or machinery any goods, wares, or merchandise (breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber excepted) not otherwise specifically taxed as such, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, or shall put up for sale in packages, with his own name or trade-mark thereon, any articles or compound not otherwise specifically taxed, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000, shall pay for every additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000 two dollars, and the amount of sales in excess of the rate of $5,000 per annum shall be returned quarterly yearly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on the excess of $5,000 shall be assessed by the assessor and paid quarterly yearly in the months of January, April, July, and October of each year, as other taxes are assessed and paid. And the first assessment herein provided for shall be made in the month of July, 1868, for the three months then next preceding.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller who shall defraud or attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do or omit to do any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States under any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report in writing such knowledge or information to his next superior officer and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no compromise, discontinuance, or nolle prosequi of any prosecution under this act shall be allowed without the permission in writing of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General.

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
J. M. HOWARD,
O. P. MORTON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
JAMES BROOKS,

T. W. FERRY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the report be printed, so that we may know something more about it, and that the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will not feel it his duty to do that, because this bill takes effect on Wednesday, and we have stricken out all that to which any objection was made in the Senate in the debate of Saturday. As this bill is of such pressing importance and as it is to take effect on Wednesday, and will be such a great relief to the country, the report was agreed to unanimously by the two committees of conference; and I trust the Senator will withdraw the motion and allow us to take the vote.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is utterly impossible to be prepared to either discuss or vote on a measure of this importance upon the mere reading of it by the Secretary. I do not think that the Senate can be informed of the effect of this legislation so fully as to justify them in acting upon it this morning. It is to be regretted that the measure is crowded up so near to the day it is to take effect; but that is no answer when Senators desire an opportunity to know what the proposition of the committee really is. Now, I do not suppose there is a Senator here who knows—

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that every word of this is printed on the table with some slight modifications of the fourth section exempting breadstuffs and lumber, excepting the last section which takes away the power to compromise under this act except with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury and Attorney General. I will ask the Secretary to read the last section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no compromise, discontinuance, or nolle prosequi of any prosecution under this act shall be allowed without the permission in writing of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not able to tell what change this makes in the law. It provides for the forfeiture of property and for personal punishment. How does the law now stand? There are forfeitures of property, confiscation, if I may so express it, under the judgment of a court as the law now stands; but what changes does this propose? I think it is due to the Senate that we should have an opportunity to know what it is. I have no objection to passing it to-morrow, if it is right, but I think we ought to postpone it until to-morrow and have it printed. Therefore I make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the report of the committee be printed and the subject postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope not. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CATTELL. It is a very important bill. Let us have a vote.

Mr. GRIMES. It is still more important that we should understand what the bill is than it is that we should have a vote. I want to understand from the chairman of the committee whether or not there is a provision here that if a party shall surreptitiously introduce into leased property a small distillery, and the discovery is made that there is a violation of law going on there, the property of the lessor shall be forfeited.

Mr. SHERMAN. The section as it now stands, I think, for offenses that occur after it takes effect, does forfeit the property, but not for offenses that occurred before, nor as to leases that occurred before. It would not affect anything that occurred before the passage of this act.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I might vote for this report, and certainly I should not object to it but for a portion of the section preceding the last. It reads that if any officer or agent appointed, acting under the authority of the revenue laws of the United States, "shall be guilty of gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office," he is to be punished on conviction. I can never consent to place a man in a position to be punished merely on the broad general ground of "gross neglect." That cannot be the ground of a criminal prosecution; it may be of civil liability; but to make it a crime on the part of the party defendant when it was the consequence of a want of capacity, or of carelessness, if you will, is entirely without precedent, and I should be unwilling to consent to such a principle being established.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the honorable member from Ohio is mistaken as to the effect of this bill. If it is to go over I have no desire to say anything; and I think it ought to go over, that we may understand exactly the effect of the bill. If we are to act on it now I will say that the explanation made by the honorable member from Ohio is not satisfactory to me in the particular as to which inquiry was made by the honorable member from Iowa. If there be a lease now, a continuing lease, the lessor having no knowledge at all of the purpose for which his property was to be used, and the property shall hereafter be used so as to bring it within the terms of this act, the lessor's interest would be forfeited. Again, assuming that it does not cover the case of an existing lease, it certainly covers the case of leases to be made hereafter. Parties may very well lease their houses without the slightest knowledge of the purpose to which the lessee is about to devote them; the lessor may be altogether innocent; and yet, under this bill, if the lessee does use the premises in contravention of the terms of this bill, the property of the lessor is to be forfeited. That appears to me to be very rigid. I cannot tell, without seeing the bill in print, whether that is the scope of it or not; but I so understand from the reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see Senators are determined not to allow the vote to be taken on this matter before we are compelled to proceed to another duty. I therefore give notice that at as early an hour of the day as I can possibly do it I will move an adjournment of the court of impeachment, with a view to continue the discussion of this bill. In the meantime I will try to get it printed. I have no doubt it can be printed by three or four o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the order to print will be entered now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the subject be postponed until to-morrow, and that the report be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the postponement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I modify my motion so as to make it simply an order to print. I do not care about what time we debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is that the report be entered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE. I simply want to say that if I understand this report it is satisfactory to me, but I suppose my name is not appended to it. I learned this morning for the first time officially, and only upon inquiry at the desk, that I was upon the committee of conference. The paper yesterday reported that it was Mr. HOWARD who was a member of the committee. I never received any notice of the meeting of the committee; I did not know that there had been any meeting of the committee, and did not know until this morning that I was a member of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe my name was audibly announced on the appointment of the committee, and I received a formal notice from the proper clerk to attend the meeting of the conferees this morning, which I did, and I signed the report accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] were appointed on the committee.

Mr. HOWE. I was so informed at the desk this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the trouble grew out of the similarity of name. I heard the Chair or some one distinctly announce Mr. HOWARD, the Senator from Michigan, as a member of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; Mr. HOWE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Either of them would have been very acceptable indeed, and I suppose both agree substantially. Mr. HOWARD's name was printed in the papers as one of the committee, and the clerk gave notice accordingly.

The report was ordered to be printed.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF R. R. BUTLER.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose House bill No. 870, on which I was speaking, is now again before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President now, I suppose I shall not be able to proceed with my remarks at this time, as the hour has arrived for entering upon another duty. I can only express my regret that I was not permitted to go on and conclude my speech this morning, though under the circumstances it was impossible to refuse the request of the Senator from Ohio, that I should give way to him that he might make a report upon the very interesting and important bill which we have been considering so long. I only desire it to be understood that when this subject comes up again I shall be entitled to the floor.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 970) to provide for a temporary and provisional government for Alabama was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour having arrived when all legislative business is ordered to cease preparatory to the Senate entering upon the business of the impeachment of the President of the United States, no further business is in order, and the House of Representatives will be notified of the fact that the Senate is ready to receive them. The chair will now be vacated, that the Chief Justice may take it for the purpose of presiding over the Senate in the trial of the impeachment of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore thereupon vacated the chair; and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson. The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the conference report which was under consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire why it is that the committee have introduced into this bill a new proposition to exempt all manufacturers of lumber and flour? If there be any class of manufacturers in this country who are well able to pay a tax it is the manufacturers of lumber, whom we have protected by our present tariff bill by a duty of from two to three dollars upon every thousand feet of lumber; and it is precisely the same case with the manufacturers of flour. The tax will be of no appreciable disadvantage to the agriculturist and will realize a considerable amount to the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only answer I can make is that I believe it is a species of humbug to exempt breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber; but the Senate substantially decided this question, as I considered, on the vote the other day. There is no reason in the world why flour should not pay two cents a barrel and lumber should not pay the insignificant tax that was put upon it; but I do not consider it important to endanger or delay this bill by this exception, which I very reluctantly yielded to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio what change the fifth section will make in the law?

Mr. SHERMAN. The particular change is that it makes the punishment both fine and imprisonment. It takes away the discretion of the judge to merely fine and not imprison. I think it is a little more stringent, too, in the forfeiture clause; but I cannot say positively upon that point.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio. The difference between this proposition and the bill as presented on Saturday, as I understand, is that this confines the punishment to the individual, not to all the distillers of the district.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. I would state to the Senate that the chief change made was in striking out the second clause of the fifth section, which authorized the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to close all the distilleries of a district in a certain state of facts. That is the only material change. Then, we add the last section providing for taking away from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the power to compromise cases arising under this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. What are those cases arising under this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Cases of criminal accusations or indictments under the fifth and sixth sections.

Mr. CONNESS. And in regard to that proposition it is required that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General shall both agree before any such case shall be discharged.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. Before any suit is discontinued or nolle prosequi or compromised it requires the joint consent of both of those officers. The committee thought it best to hold two of the principal officers of the Government responsible for such action.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether this act intended to relieve from taxation all manufactures which are not sold. It provides for a tax on all over $5,000 of sales. There is a vast amount of manufactures in this country that are never sold—the railroads of the country and various other branches manufacture for themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that this is only a tax on sales. It extends the principle of the wholesale dealers' tax to the manufacturers, and only applies to sales. Railroads pay in a different way, as the Senator is aware.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not desire to delay the passage of this bill, but I am somewhat surprised that the chairman of the Committee on Finance should denounce as a humbug the exemption of lumber and breadstuffs. Why, sir, we have exempted them from the very start, in the first bill and in every bill since, from all taxation. I should consider it something worse than a humbug for us to impose a new tax upon articles that have been exempted throughout the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will say that these articles are taxed now, this day, precisely as they would be as the bill was framed before; that is, when a wholesale dealer sells lumber it is taxed; when a wholesale dealer sells flour it is taxed. As the bill stood before, the manufacturer was also to pay an insignificant tax. I say that any discrimination between the various articles of production, levying taxes upon one and not upon another, is invidious and unjust. I might get up and make a very plausible argument to show that a poor man's boots ought not to be taxed and a poor man's coat ought not to be taxed, just as much as a poor man's flour ought not to be taxed. Lumber we know very well, the great body of it, is consumed by the rich, and bought by the rich.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not propose to make a long speech, and I do not propose that the Senator shall make a longer one in mine. I merely desired to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these exemptions have existed hitherto, and, as I was about saying, I should consider it something worse than a humbug to begin now, in time of peace, to impose a new tax upon these articles particularly which have been hitherto exempt. And there is a propriety in exempting lumber—

Mr. FERRY and Mr. RAMSEY. They are exempt by the bill now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know they are exempt.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what that propriety is?

Mr. FERRY. That is an outside question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. For the reason that it is used for building purposes. It is desirable that we should encourage enterprise throughout our country for building purposes, and we have not only exempted lumber heretofore but every article so far as we could that went into a house or building. We have exempted brick, building stone, and lime. In relation to flour, the millers derive but a very small amount of profit for grinding wheat. It is brought here, say from the West to Oswego, and ground, and if this bill had not been amended you would compel these flouring mills that grind it to pay upon the whole amount of their sales, when the amount of their profits is but a very small percentage.

Mr. RAMSEY. Flour is exempt now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not desire to debate the question.

Mr. GRIMES. I am astonished that the remarks I made on the subject of lumber a year and a half ago should have made such a deep impression on the Senator from Vermont; for I am satisfied that he cannot have read the debate recently, and yet he has repeated exactly, in behalf of the exemption from tax of lumber, the arguments that I used against the imposition of two or three dollars a thousand as tariff duty upon lumber brought in from Canada and the British Provinces. I insisted then that the enterprise of the country should be encouraged, that every man should have an opportunity to build a residence to shelter his family from the storm; and in order to encourage that kind of enterprise and domestic economy and domestic comfort, I insisted with the gentlemen who were acting with the Senator from Vermont on this subject that we should not put upon those who desired to erect dwellings for their families a burden of two or three dollars a thousand on the lumber necessary to go into their houses; but I was overruled in that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator remembers at all what my course was, he must know that I was for the lowest duty.

Mr. GRIMES. The lumber men are among the richest men in this country, having the largest capital; and so it is precisely with these large merchant millers. There is not any class of the population who are better able to pay this tax than they are. The Senator speaks of it as though it was the imposition of a new tax. I do not understand it in that light. You tax them now if their sales amount to a certain sum. You will only tax them precisely as you tax everybody else who makes money out of lumber and flour.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I just want to say one word in reply to one point the honorable Senator from Iowa makes. He seems to assume that the domestic article, as in the case of lumber, will always attain the price of the foreign article with the duty added, whatever that duty may be, which is not the case, for in almost all instances the price of the domestic article is subject to domestic competition. The statement the Senator makes would seem to claim that this three dollars a thousand is added to the price of the lumber, which is not the case.

Mr. GRIMES. That may be so where the Senator is familiar with it; but that is not the case on the prairies of Illinois and Iowa where we wish an opportunity to have lumber brought in from the Canadas in order to develop our country.

Mr. CONNESS. Wisconsin furnishes you with lumber.

Mr. GRIMES. No.

Mr. CONKLING. If I am to vote for this report I shall have to do so in spite of several things that it contains, and not for the sake of them. I wish to call attention now, however, only to the last section proposed. The object of it is one of the most wholesome and commendable in the world, as explained in part the other day by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] to break up what is deemed loose or corrupt practice in the compromise of prosecution. Now, from the knowledge I have of such things, and the workings of the present system, I believe that, inadvertently of course, the committee has contrived a provision better for favoritism, for loose practice, for insecure administration, than anything that has ever crept before or been put by design into the revenue legislation of the country.

Now, Mr. President, look at this for one moment. "No compromise, discontinuance, or nolle prosequi, of any prosecution under this act shall be allowed without the permission in writing of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General." What are they to know about this? Under what evidence are they to act? The Attorney General will act upon the recommendation of the district attorney, the very officer against whose bad or loose practice, as I am told, the disposition is to guard. The district attorney belongs to the official staff of the Attorney General; he is his subordinate officer; he is in the line of his own Department; and as far as the Attorney General can have any official information at all, it is to come from the district attorney. Then what is the Secretary of the Treasury to know about it? He is to know from his official subordinates. The best source from which he can derive his information would be the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the officer next below him in this line of descent; and he is to derive it, as he does now, from the revenue officers of the district, the assessor and the collector and their deputies. Does this give any additional security?

But, Mr. President, observe the security with which it parts, namely, the intervention of the court. I recollect a period of history which illustrates this in a very marked way in my own State. Up to the time of the great excitement that arose in reference to the alleged murder of Morgan, the attorney general of the State of New York, and the district attorneys, had the power to enter nolle prosequis, each of his own motion, and favoritism was charged. Then by statute the advice and concurrence of the court was required; and ever since in the State of New York nolle prosequis have been entered only upon open motion in court, and the action of the court upon the case before it; and experience has shown, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] knows very well, the experience of the courts and of the public has shown that a most admirable safeguard was thus set up. No district attorney, or attorney general since that time has been able to put an indictment in his pocket without assigning reasons to anybody, enter a nolle prosequi, or dismiss a prosecution, because it was to be done in the light of day, with the eyes of both sides in the interest upon the persons who did it, and a fair opportunity to be heard.

That exists now with regard to indictments and nolle prosequis under the existing statute of the United States. But what does this section propose? To withdraw the subject entirely from the court; to take it away; therefore the court is never to be heard at all unless the judge volunteers as a petitioner or a correspondent or a citizen to address the Treasury Department for permission to be given by two officers here in Washington who cannot in the nature of things know anything about it, except upon the representation of such persons as get access to them. Does anybody doubt that it is to become more or less a matter of favoritism?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And will be referred to some clerk.

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator says, it will be referred to some clerk or go into the hands of some person connected with the Department; and in the event the defendant being represented by an attorney, a claim agent, some man with political standing, who will go and intercede with him, he will be heard; and in the event of his not being represented in that way, he will never be heard at all.

It seems to me that we shall be like that celebrated engineer who was "hoist with his own petard." We are devising here a mode of withdrawing these transactions from the very presence in which they cannot to any extent be perverted, and enacting that they shall be disposed of in secret. I do not use the word offensively in the absence of the public, in the absence of the proper parties, and upon testimony which must be ex parte, which must be partial, and that, too, by officers hundreds and thousands of miles from the scene of the controversy to be settled.

Whether it is worth while for Senators who agree with me in these views to vote to send back this report, I ought not to affirm, perhaps; but I hope this will not be drawn into a precedent, and that we shall not have, with regard to offenses provided for in the revenue laws generally, a provision by which, in a closet up here at the Treasury Department, on the recommendation of some clerk, a thing is to be done which a court cannot do, with parties and counsel before it, and an opportunity to understand and ventilate the whole subject.

Mr. GRIMES. I can perhaps relieve the Senator by informing him that this does not apply to cases already existing, but is prospective.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator had listened to what I was saying he would have been relieved himself instead of relieving me, because my last remark was that I hoped this would not be drawn into a precedent to apply to cases under other acts; for if good under this act it will be argued it is good under others, and when we get the tax bill here there will probably be some amendment to it by which we shall be asked to cut off the bad practices of district attorneys by putting the whole thing into this mill of bureaucracy here and have it run through this hopper, with clerks, and with the red tape and circumlocution of these Departments. I believe that even with the wisest and purest administration of things here at the seat of the central Government, nothing conduces more to a pure administration of justice than to keep it in its appropriate channels, and keep it before the local tribunals, and especially the judicial tribunals who have parties representing all interests before them and have the public to watch them and see that they do not fall into error or into corrupt practices.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am as anxious as the Senator from New York to provide some surety for the enforcement of the revenue laws. Now, sir, does not that Senator know perfectly well—of course he does—that it is one of the usual and ordinary powers of a United States district attorney to discontinue or to nolle prosequi his indictments or his informations that he has filed whenever he sees fit to do so? And I know of no statute of the United States which restricts his authority in this respect. He is under no obligation at all to ask leave of the court to enter a nolle prosequi under the laws of the United States. It is undoubtedly one of the greatest evils connected with our system of revenue laws, that the district attorneys of the United States are found wanting in their duty, wanting in energy, activity, and perseverance in prosecuting offenses which come to their knowledge; and it too often occurs, sir, that a prosecuting attorney favors friends; and I might go further, and I of easy virtue suffers himself to be persuaded to nolle prosequi or discontinue his prosecutions in will go further and declare here, in my place, that according to my information this is one of the greatest sources of corruption and abuse that exist in the administration of our laws. It is not a difficult thing for an ingenious and wealthy party, resting under a serious accusation, to approach a district attorney of easy virtue and buy him out. This has given rise to a great deal of expense and a great deal of injustice and abuse. The object of this provision in the report of the committee is to take from the district attorney the power which he now has in all cases, wherever he sees fit, to discontinue his proceedings; and if there be good cause for the discontinuance of a particular case, it requires the joint action of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Attorney General of the United States to authorize him to discontinue his proceedings. We have there some safeguard, to say the least, against the weaknesses, the corruption, and the dishonesty of district attorneys.

Mr. CONKLING. With the permission of the Senator I beg to ask him a question. Take the case of such a district attorney as he supposes, a man corrupt and approached by wealthy parties, and I inquire of the Senator which, in his judgment, such a district attorney would be most likely to impose upon—the court in which the indictment was pending, or the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury by representations that he might make here at the city of Washington.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the court spoken of by the Senator has nothing to do with the question of a discontinuance or a nolle prosequi. It is the right of the district attorney to withdraw his proceedings without asking leave of the court or showing any cause or reason for it; but, even if it were to be by leave of the court, in most cases we know very well that upon the recommendation of the district attorney the court would be very likely to grant its consent to a discontinuance, because the court is not presumed to know, is not presumed to be informed of the nature of the prosecution or of the facts which are really involved in the case. The court never inquires into that, but always relies, and necessarily relies, upon the United States district attorney.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan where can the Secretary of the Treasury or the Attorney General get any information as to the evidence that was before the grand jury, except from the district attorney?

Mr. HOWARD. It is not a difficult thing for the Attorney General or the Secretary of the Treasury to correspond with the district attorney, to correspond with the collector of the district or the assessor of the district; it is not difficult to send a special agent, as is often the case, to make inquiry and to report the necessary information to the head of one or the other of these Departments. It is a very easy thing; and, besides all that, an application to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General for leave to discontinue a case must necessarily give rise to some delay, and thus furnish opposite parties in interest an opportunity to correspond with these high officers and to present the real facts of the case before them. This is, at least, some security against abuse of authority on the part of the district attorneys, whereas, if the law is left as it is now, the Government have no security whatever against those practices to which I have referred.

I hope, sir, that this clause will be adopted. I see in it a very important security for the Government, and I see in it a possibility, nay, sir, a probability, of making it necessary for the district attorneys to prosecute the suits which they commenced and to bring somebody to justice and send somebody to the penitentiary, instead of selling out the case themselves and putting the avails in their own pockets, as is too often done, I fear.

Mr. MORTON. I think some of the objections taken by the Senator from New York to this section are just. I, for one, was opposed to allowing the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General to authorize these indictments to be nolle prosequi; but I accepted this section, as one member of the committee as the best that could be done. I will say to the Senator from New York, in answer to his objection, that if it is the law now or if it is now the practice that the district attorney cannot nolle prosequi indictments without the consent of the court this section will not change it. It simply requires in addition the consent or permission of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General. If, according to the practice in any of the States, the consent of the court is necessary to nolle prosequi an indictment, that consent is not made unnecessary by this section, but simply the written consent of these other officers in addition is required.

I think, Mr. President, that something very important will be gained even by this section, imperfect as it is, because, I think, it will have the effect to locate somewhere this great responsibility which is now located nowhere, which is floating about between so many officers, and for which nobody is taken to account. Every compromise that is made hereafter by which a great criminal shall escape punishment for a fraud upon the revenue is to be taken right home by the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury. It cannot be done without their consent; and although I am opposed to authorizing them to give consent, yet I think this is better than nothing; it is so much gained; and I shall cooperate with the Senator from New York and with any other Senator on this floor, when the tax or revenue bill comes here, in providing that there shall be no power by which criminal prosecutions for frauds upon the revenue can be compromised away. I believe that the conviction and the punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary of twenty-five whisky scoundrels would add $25,000,000 to the revenue.

Mr. CONKLING. I rose merely to remind the Senator from Indiana that he apparently overlooks one of the provisions of an existing statute. The last tax bill provides, in most specific and unavoidable language, that no compromise whatever shall be made, except on just such a permission as is proposed here on the part of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the Commissioner has nothing to do with the suits that may be commenced. He has nothing to do with pending prosecutions, if I recollect the laws properly.

Mr. CONKLING. My recollection is that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is to take part in every compromise that is made, and the section which I will refer to is on page 135 of the revenue act:

"The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to compromise, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, any case arising under the internal revenue laws, whether pending in court or otherwise."

Mr. HOWARD. Read all the section.

Mr. CONKLING. I will.

"The several circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all offenses against any of the provisions of this act committed within their several districts: Provided, That whenever, in any civil action for a penalty, the informer may be a witness for the prosecution, the party against whom such penalty is claimed may be and shall be admitted as a witness on his own behalf."

The residue of the section has nothing to do with it. So that I am right in saying that as the law stands as to all prosecutions which have gone to indictment, to presentment by a grand jury, the practice and the statute regulating proceeding of the court in the first place apply as to other indictments. In the next place, by act of Congress, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is vested with the supervising and discretionary power to see to these compromises; and, more than that, he may exercise that power only under such regulations and directions as the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes. That is the law now. So the Senator from Indiana can hardly say, in view of this statute, that this power lies about somewhere, not located anywhere. It is located by the practice in the court as to prosecutions which have gone further than presentment by a grand jury, and then with a power above the court, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The proposition now is by legislation which does not seem to me to be cumulative, as the Senator suggested, nor in confirmation of the power of the court, but which seems to be exclusive and absorbing in its character, to give to two high officers of this Government, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General, the power, upon the ipse dixit in writing of both of them, to allow any prosecution under this act that they choose to be compromised. Now, sir, here it is, and it is to be taken; it is aut Caesar aut nullus as far as that is concerned; but I think it is very unfortunate that we have departed from the old practice.

With the present provision added, I believe we shall see reason to regret the change we make.

Mr. HOWARD. In reply to what the Senator has said, it seems to me to be sufficient to say that if, with all the vigor and vigilance which it has been possible for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to exercise in such cases, we have continued to lose millions upon millions of the public revenue in the shape of compromises; and if thousands and tens of thousands of criminals have escaped unwhipped of justice in consequence of his failure to apply the proper remedy or to make the proper regulation, it is high time the power were taken out of his hands and given to some other officer of the Government who will attend to and enforce the laws rigorously and carefully.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall not vote for this report, because I do not agree to the fifth section nor to the last. My colleague thinks that the law as it now stands distributes the responsibility, and therefore there are no good results. I think this proposition is to distribute the responsibility. If an indictment be pending in the United States court the district attorney is authorized by law to enter a nolle prosequi, if he thinks it right; but he can do that only with the approval of the court. It is done in the presence of the community where the indictment is presented, and not far perhaps from the locality of the offense itself. Here is a direct responsibility upon the district attorney, and he is under the check and control of the court. Instead of that, you propose that he shall report the case to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Attorney General, and if, after consultation, they decide to nolle prosequi the case, what is the effect? The Attorney General says he acted upon the advice of the district attorney; and the Secretary of the Treasury says that he has got his information from the district attorney, and the district attorney when called upon to respond to public opinion about it says that he has the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General. The result of it is that there is no direct responsibility to the public opinion in regard to the case. That is my judgment of it practically.

Mr. HOWARD. Are not the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General responsible?

Mr. HENDRICKS. They are responsible upon the information that is furnished to them. They can only act upon information that the district attorney gives to them. Sir, there is so much noise and confusion in the Chamber that I cannot hear myself. I do not believe the Senate cares anything about this, for I do not think anybody is heard in speaking upon it. It is a matter of a good deal of importance, and I wish to say a little upon it; but if it is not agreeable that the question shall be discussed I shall not do so. It is about liquor to be sure, and liquor ought to be pursued, and all men that deal in liquor ought to be, perhaps, put to death, according to the judgment of some gentlemen. I do not agree to that myself. I undertook to say to the Senate, but I was not heard—the chairman of the committee in my rear makes so much confusion that I cannot hear myself—and with the permission of the committee I will suggest to them that the proposition of the last section is to water all responsibility until there is none. The district attorney will say to the public, "I have acted under the advice of the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury." The Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General will say, "We have got our advice from the law officer at the locality."

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask my colleague one question, whether it can possibly make it any worse than it now is?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think a great deal worse; for if you leave the matter with the district attorney in the community where the indictment is found, where the offense has been committed, he is under the check of public opinion where the crime itself has been perpetrated; but if he is authorized to refer the question up to Washington and he can say to the community, "I have referred it up there;" and he gets the advice of the Attorney General, when he comes to act upon the subject his responsibility is gone. Within the scope of my observation I do not know any case in which the district attorney has disregarded a proper public opinion.

But, Mr. President, I am more particularly opposed to this fifth section. It requires that the punishment shall be by a fine and imprisonment. There are many cases where that punishment ought not to be inflicted. Is any Senator afraid of the Federal courts? I have not heard the integrity of the courts questioned in regard to the liquor-tax question.

A Senator in my rear says that there are such cases; but I have not heard of them. I know there can none arise in the district in which I practice law. The district judge there is not only an eminent jurist, but is distinguished for his integrity.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to be understood as saying there are any imputations of dishonesty, but there are great complaints made in regard to the conduct of judges in these cases in letting off persons at nominal penalties and punishments; in some cases the fines were less than one tenth the value of the whisky out of the tax on which the Government was defrauded.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not heard of any such case. I am not familiar with very many of them. In my profession I have only defended, as I now recollect, one man charged as defendant in a whisky case; and every Senator here, if he had known of that case, would say that this law that you now propose to enact would in that case have been a public outrage, a simple outrage. That man was a very humble man. He had a little still on his own farm. He never had manufactured for public sale, but just for the accommodation of his neighbors, manufacturing a very good article. He took out a license for one month, the month of April, and he got along and manufactured a part of a barrel, but did not complete it. Afterward when he returned to it, he finished that one barrel, perhaps in the month of August. That man was the defendant in three indictments and one civil suit, all in relation to one barrel. I think he sold it to his neighbors. He was an old acquaintance of mine and he came to see me about it. He was scared nearly to death, and was likely to be broken up. I got to know all about the facts and saw the district attorney, and had him nolle prosequi two of the indictment cases, and dismiss the civil suit, and take a fine on the remaining criminal case, enough to cover the tax that the Government ought to have; I do not recollect what; but the tax was paid. There was no question about that. Now, if that man had had to go to the penitentiary it would have been an outrage simply, unmixed, unquestionably.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my colleague that the man's poverty explains the whole matter. He had nothing to give to anybody.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There was not enough of it to justify giving anything. It was a little trifling case; but this law would have sent him to the penitentiary; and it is proposed that there shall be no nolle entered and then his only salvation would be an appeal to the presidential clemency. That ought not to be. The law is right now. The law says that the judge, not the jury, shall decide upon the punishment; and I do not think we have occasion to question the integrity of the Federal judges. If the juries had the power in the Federal courts as in some of the State courts to decide upon the punishment, it might be another question; but the jury merely finds the question of guilt or innocence, and then the court decides upon the punishment. Are we afraid of the court?

Mr. TIPTON. Will the Senator from Indiana give way for a motion to adjourn? It is now after five o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER and others. No; no; let us finish this bill.

Mr. TIPTON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON and others. No, no; let us finish the bill.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going on to say that the security of the Government is ample in the fact that the courts prescribe the penalty; and the law, as it now stands, being in the alternative, is as it should be; and if the judge hearing the case says that imprisonment ought to be added to the fine, the judge can so order. That is right. Therefore I shall vote against the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate stands adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Half past eleven.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, twelve o'clock; that is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. The court meets at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 30, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is calling the States and Territories (commencing with the State of Maine) for bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider; during which call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order.

THIRD ASSISTANT ENGINEERS.

Mr. ELIOT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 981) relating to third assistant engineers in the Naval Academy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION, ETC.

Mr. CHURCHILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 982) to amend an act entitled "An act relative to the election of the President and Vice President of the United States and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the office both of President and Vice President," approved March 1, 1792; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the reading of the bill in full.

The Clerk read the bill. It proposes to amend the ninth and tenth sections of the act named in the title. The ninth section, as proposed to be amended, will provide that in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore; and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and in case there shall be no Speaker of the House of Representatives, then the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, shall, for the time being, act as President of the United States until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

The tenth section as proposed to be amended will enact that whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant more than eighteen months before the expiration of the term for which they were elected, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, specifying that electors of the President and Vice President of the United States shall be appointed in the several States on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November next ensuing, the Tuesday next after the first Monday in which shall not be less than sixty days after the occurring of both of said vacancies, at which time the electors shall accordingly be appointed. The said electors, when appointed, shall meet and give their votes for President and Vice President of the United States on the first Wednesday of December then next ensuing, and the proceedings and duties of the said electors and of others shall be pursuant to the directions of the Constitution and laws of the United States respecting the election of President and Vice President of the United States; and the persons so chosen to be President and Vice President of the United States shall hold said offices for the term of four years, to commence on the 4th day of March then next ensuing. Whenever electors of President and Vice President of the United States shall be appointed as provided for by this section, on account of those offices having both become vacant, subsequent appointments of such electors shall be made the Tuesday following the first Monday in November in each fourth year thereafter.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PENSIONS.

Mr. CHURCHILL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 988) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TAFTE asked and obtained leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH also asked and obtained leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. BEAMAN asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of April 21, 1808, and July 17, 1862, statements of the contracts made by the Quartermaster's Department during February, 1868, be printed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—NEW JERSEY.

Mr. HAIGHT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, "withdrawing the consent of that State to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, entitled article fourteen, and rescinding the joint resolution approved September 11, A. D. 1862, whereby it was resolved that said proposed amendment was ratified by the Legislature of the State."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the reading of this resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the call for the reading of this document will be withdrawn. It will consume a large part of the morning hour and prevent the introduction of bills by other gentlemen.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The resolution is not long. It will not take any great length of time to read it, or, if it should, I will not insist on the continuance of the reading.

The Clerk proceeded to read the joint resolution, but was interrupted by Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, who objected to the resolution being received.

The SPEAKER. It is too late, as the reading has commenced.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not know what it was.

Mr. HAIGHT. Let it be read, and if there is any objection to it it may be considered afterward.

The Clerk continued the reading, and was again interrupted by Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, who inquired if a motion would be in order to return the resolution to the New Jersey Legislature?

The SPEAKER. It would not, because all papers presented in the morning hour of Monday must, under the rules, be referred to some committee without debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will withdraw the call for the reading of the resolution provided it may be printed in the Globe.

The SPEAKER. It may as well be read, because in a very few moments it will be half past twelve o'clock, when the House will have to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole and proceed to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. PILE. Let it be read, and then I will object to the printing.

The Clerk resumed the reading, and was again interrupted by Mr. BOUTWELL, who raised the question of order that the paper was not respectful to the House, referring particularly to the last sentence read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman has no right to interrupt the reading.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the paper must be read and referred without debate. Any question in regard to its reception or its character cannot be settled at this time.

The Clerk resumed the reading until interrupted by

The SPEAKER, who said: The hour of half-past twelve o'clock has now arrived, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

HOOR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman suggest any time for meeting to-morrow?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest that we meet at a quarter before twelve—time enough to have the Journal read.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the House will meet at eleven o'clock.

Mr. SCHENCK. I feel constrained to state to the House that the committee of conference on the bill relieving manufactures from tax agreed this morning to a report which has been presented to the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate informed me that they proposed to take it up now, immediately after having gone into legislative session, and hoped to dispose of the report of the committee of conference and agree to it this evening. I trust, therefore, as the bill is to go into effect on the 1st of April, if it becomes a law, that we will meet early to-morrow, at least at eleven o'clock, if not half past ten, so that the report may be made here and acted on.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the House meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent or a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KERR. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it in order now to move to suspend the rules? I believe there is a motion pending.

The SPEAKER. The resolution presented by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAIGHT] was being read when the House went in the Committee of the Whole to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I give notice, then, that when that is disposed of I will move to suspend the rules that the House may meet at half past ten o'clock to-morrow. I hope that all who are interested in the question of the tax on manufactures remain here.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman cannot interrupt the reading of the resolution presented by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAIGHT] to give any notice or for any other purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, on considering the subject, will rule that as the morning hour on Monday, unlike the other morning hours, expires at exactly one hour after the Journal is read, the morning hour has expired and the reading of the resolution presented by the gentleman from New Jersey goes over until Monday next.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I desire to move a resolution in regard to the paper presented by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BANKS. Let us settle the question of adjournment first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois that the resolution to which he alludes is not yet before the House. The reading of it has not been completed and it goes over until Monday next.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules so as to order that the House shall meet to-morrow at half past ten o'clock.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 74—not one fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The question was put; and eighteen voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are not ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is not that enough for tellers?

The SPEAKER. It requires one fifth of a quorum absolutely to order tellers, and that is now twenty as a quorum of ninety-six. Tellers are not ordered, and the yeas and nays are not ordered.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman will make a general motion to suspend the rules, so that we can fix the time for meeting hereafter. If the Senate meets every day at twelve o'clock for the impeachment trial the House ought to meet earlier.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer to limit my motion to the one day. I want it understood that all this filibustering is to prevent the speedy passage of a bill to relieve manufactures from taxation.

Mr. ROSS. I want it understood that it is because we are hungry and want our dinners.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want it understood that if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] wanted to relieve the laborers we would go with him.

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh! yes; we understand. The question was then taken upon suspending the rules and ordering that the House shall meet to-morrow at half past ten o'clock a. m., and (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and it was ordered accordingly.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—NEW JERSEY.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of directing the return to the member who presented it, of the paper purporting to be a resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey.

Mr. HAIGHT. I suppose the Chair has already decided that the resolution is not before the House to be returned.

The SPEAKER. The chair will hear the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] before ruling upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I offer the following resolution, and if there is objection to it, I will move to suspend the rules:

Resolved, That the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, presented by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HAIGHT], purporting to withdraw the assent of said State to the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article, be returned by the Speaker of the House to the gentleman who presented it, and that its title only shall be referred to in the Journal of the House, and in the Congressional Globe, and further that this House denies the constitutional right of any State Legislature to withdraw such assent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule upon the question of order made by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HAIGHT.] If the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was a simple resolution, the Chair would rule that it was unquestionably not in order. But the gentleman moves to suspend the rules for the purpose of making the order indicated. The rules can be suspended even for the purpose of taking a petition which is before a committee and returning it to the member who presented it, or taking any other paper not directly before the House from the files of the House and referring it to some committee, or sending it to any person named in the order. This is a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of making a certain order, which the Chair thinks is in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The Chair has already decided that the resolution of New Jersey had gone over until Monday next. Can the rules be suspended for the purpose of bringing before the House a paper not now before it?

The SPEAKER. The paper is in the custody of the House, though not immediately before it. It is in precisely the same condition, so far as respects the proposed order, as if it had been referred to a committee. It is not before the House for action.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it not still the property and in the possession of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HAIGHT]?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It must have been out of his possession, and in the possession of the House, for the Chair made a ruling upon it just before the recess to-day, which he could not have done had it still been in possession of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The Chair has ruled that it is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If not before the House must it not be still the property of the gentleman from New Jersey?

The SPEAKER. It is not; because although it is not now before the House for its action, it is in the custody of the House, and must have been before it to enable the Chair to rule upon it, as he did before the recess.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have modified my resolution somewhat, and now move to suspend the rules in order to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, purporting to withdraw the assent of said State to the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth amendment, be returned by the Speaker of the House to the gentleman who presented it, for the reason that the same is disrespectful to the House and scandalous in character, and that its title only shall be referred to in the Journal of the House and in the Congressional Globe.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the reading of the resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the right to demand the reading of the resolution.

Mr. ROSS. Have we not a right to have it read before we determine whether it is scandalous or not?

The SPEAKER. That is a question to govern the votes of members upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. That is, whether we, who did not happen to be in the House when this paper was read, have not the right to know what it is that is termed scandalous?

The SPEAKER. It is presumed that every member is in his place from the time of meeting until adjournment, unless absent by leave of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The document referred to has not been read to this House. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS], who was absent, is in no worse position than myself, who was here. The document has never been read to the House.

Mr. BROOKS. Is that so?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, sir; it was only partially read; and now, without knowing the contents of the document, we are called upon to vote on a resolution proposing to return it to the Legislature of New Jersey as "scandalous and disrespectful to the House."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], whose remarks present an argument under the form of a point of order, that what he states might be a consideration calculated to influence some gentlemen in their votes, but it cannot be sustained as a point of order with regard to the parliamentary position of the resolution. This resolution claims on its face that a sufficient portion of the document in question has been read to show that it is disrespectful to the House. Whether that is so or not is for the House to determine, not for the Chair.

Mr. HAIGHT. I rise to a point of order. The resolution now before the House has direct reference to the language of the resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, which I had the honor to present this morning. Now, the language of the latter resolution is not all before the House; it has not all been read; the part which has been read depends very much upon what follows; and—

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on suspending the rules for the purpose of making the order embraced in the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House adjourn.

On the motion to adjourn, there were—yeas 20, noes 77.

Mr. ROSS. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—yeas 20, noes 77.

So (one fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 80, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Beck, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Golladay, Haight, Holman, Jones, Kerr, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Pruyn, Ross, Stone, Lawrence S. Trimble, and Van Auker—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cako, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchan, Koonitz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—89.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blair, Boyer, Bromwell, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kelley, Ketcham, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Miller, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Peters, Plants, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—80.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on suspending the rules for the purpose of adopting the resolution of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 17, not voting 92; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cako, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchan, Koonitz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, Mercur, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Beck, Burr, Eldridge, Golladay, Haight, Holman, Jones, Kerr, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Ross, Stone, Lawrence S. Trimble, and Van Auker—17.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Butler, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Harding, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kelley, Ketcham, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Miller, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Peters, Plants, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, William Williams, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—92.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and the resolution of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BROOKS said: Not knowing what I am called to vote on, I decline to vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BUTLER.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House five thousand copies of the opening address of Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, one of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives on the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, before the Senate, with the accompanying brief of law authorities, and forty thousand copies without the accompanying brief.

Mr. KERR and Mr. BURR objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of referring the resolution.

Mr. KERR. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 20, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cako, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchan, Koonitz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—82.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is not the resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not; it goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand a resolution to print to be debatable. The motion to suspend the rules, which is not debatable, cannot prevent the House from debating a resolution of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point on two grounds, both of which the gentleman will recognize. The first is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of referring the resolution; the second is, even if he had not made that motion, the resolution to print must be referred to the Committee on Printing without debate. It must come back from the committee before it can be considered by the House. Therefore, while the motion to suspend the rules is to allow the resolution to be introduced, the effect of a suspension of the rules is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing. When the resolution comes back from the committee it may be debated.

Mr. SCHENCK. Can the vote to refer to the Committee on Printing be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. It goes to the committee under the law, and therefore cannot be reconsidered; even by unanimous consent the law cannot be waived. It has so been decided by the predecessors in the Speaker's chair as well as by himself.

Mr. BANKS. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following resolution:

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. STEWART. I submit that legislative business is a violation of the rule, and out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe that the trial of the impeachment was adjourned until twelve o'clock, which was the hour to which the Senate adjourned, which somewhat embarrasses the proceedings. It is the opinion of the Chair that all legislative business is suspended by the adjournment of the court, and that nothing now is in order. The Chair will be vacated under the order of the Senate, that the Chief Justice may preside over the trial of the impeachment.

The President pro tempore thereupon vacated the chair, and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson. The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned.

the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. FERRY. I move that on the trial days of the pending trial the legislative session of the Senate shall commence at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That changes the rule, and I ask that it lie over for consideration. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet during the trial at eleven o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. I hope not. Let us have an hour in the morning to transact business.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have one day to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ROSS. I object to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from Ohio yields the floor, the Committee on Printing has a right to report at any time.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is the regular order, there being no other business before the House.

The Committee on Printing can report at any time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman is going to press this resolution, the gentleman from Ohio will not be able to get his bill through to-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg the gentleman from New York to withdraw his resolution for the present.

Mr. LAFLIN. I withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the various votes by which the bills and resolutions which have been introduced were referred; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question. I submit a report from the committee of conference on House bill No. 900.

The Clerk read the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the third amendment of the Senate and agree to the said Senate amendment, with an amendment, as follows: Insert in lieu of said Senate amendment, after the enacting clause, the words: That after the 1st day of June next no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation; nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence, in writing, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the tax had been paid, and that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such drawback, or for any drawback of internal tax on exportations made prior to the passage of this act, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the 1st day of October, 1868; and the Senate agree to the same.

They recommend that the House recede from their amendments to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Insert in lieu of said Senate amendment:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, or corporation, who shall manufacture by hand or machinery any goods, wares, or merchandise (breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber excepted) not otherwise specifically taxed as such, or who shall be engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any articles or compounds not otherwise specifically taxed, or shall put up for sale in packages, with his own name or trade-mark thereon, any articles or compound not otherwise specifically taxed, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000, shall pay for every additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000 two dollars, and the amount of sales in excess of the rate of $5,000 per annum shall be returned quarterly yearly to the assistant assessor, and the tax on the excess of $5,000 shall be assessed by the assessor and paid quarterly yearly in the months of January, April, July, and October of each year, as other taxes are assessed and paid. And the first assessment herein provided for shall be made in the month of July, 1868, for the three months then next preceding.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in carrying on the business of a distiller who shall fraud or attempt to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall forfeit the distillery and distilling apparatus used by him and all distilled spirits and all raw materials for the production of distilled spirits found in the distillery and on the distillery premises, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of gross neglect in the discharge of any of the duties of his office, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do or omit to do any act with intent to enable any person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States, shall fail to report in writing such knowledge or information to his next superior officer or to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no compromise, discontinuance, or nolle prosequi of any prosection under this act shall be allowed without the permission in writing of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General.

And the Senate agree to the same.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
JAMES BROOKS,
T. W. FERRY,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN SHEERMAN,
J. M. HOWARD,
O. P. MORTON,

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, this second conference has so far narrowed the matters in question between the two Houses that I think I can submit this report to the House for its action with a very brief explanation. The first two points which were the subjects of conference were those which related to the advantage resulting to certain contractors for machinery for the Government from the remission of the tax, and regulations in regard to drawbacks. The second conference agreed to these provisions precisely as they had been agreed to before, leaving them to stand according to the former action of the House, and as was understood then, and as has since been proved, according to the wish of the Senate, the Senate now having agreed to the whole of this report.

The first question in relation to which there was any special difference to be anticipated, is that which relates to taxation. The committee of conference have agreed upon a modification of the section on that subject which the House adopted, but which the Senate did not agree to, after the former report of the committee of conference; that modification is as to this point: they left the provision of two mills tax upon all sales over $5,000 of goods manufactured and sold by any manufacturer, with the exception that the tax shall not extend to breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber.

The other point is this: the committee of conference agreed to change the time for the assessment and collection of the tax, so that, instead of being provided for monthly, the assessment and collection shall be only quarterly, four times in a year instead of twelve times. I apprehend that the House will be satisfied to adopt what it adopted before with those two points of difference, making it still more satisfactory.

As to the first section, which related to distillers and distilled spirits, the last committee of conference have agreed to strike out every part of it except the provision making it a penal offense for the distiller to carry on his business and to defraud or attempt to defraud the United States in doing so. All that relates to stopping the distillery, all that was contained in the first section adopted by the House providing for making a rule of evidence in condemning a distillery, is omitted. And there remains in this case nothing now except simply a penalty provided against any distiller who defrauds or attempts to defraud the United States in carrying on his distillery.

The next section, in relation to the punishment provided for revenue officers, for all their various misdeeds, by consigning them to the penitentiary in case of conviction, is left just as the House agreed to it before.

Then there is only one other thing agreed to by the committee of conference; that is, an additional section which takes away the right to compromise or to discontinue or enter a nolle prosequi in any suit or prosecution against a distiller, &c., under the provisions of this act, unless there is permission given in writing, signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States. The object of that is to cut off all compromises of proceedings by the settlement of which some of these officers have become enriched while offenders have escaped. With this explanation, if there be no inquiry to be made by any member, I will move the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly; as the gentleman was one of the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to say that I have signed this report because it is the only way to get a good thing, such as the House originally proposed. The bill was so far completed, before going to the committee of conference, at least in reference to Government contracts as distinguished from private contracts, that I am satisfied to acquiesce in it as a part of the bill, although I do not fully agree to it.

I have considerable doubt in my own mind as to how far the fourth section goes in reference to the tax on sales. But as that is a subject which will be subsequently investigated by the House when we commence to consider the general report of the Committee of Ways and Means, we can then correct whatever may need correction.

I wish the House had not been called upon thus early to act on the subject of fines and penalties as to distilleries and distillation, the duties on whisky, &c., but that we had waited for the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not believe it is ever possible to collect two dollars a gallon tax on whisky, and I do not believe these fines and penalties will benefit the matter in any degree. On the contrary, sir, I am inclined to think it will rather propagate fraud and perjury and other crimes. I have signed the bill notwithstanding.

Mr. SCHENCK. We shall have these subjects open for discussion hereafter in the House; but, as my colleague on the committee has remarked, this is the best we could do. We believe it will be more satisfactory to the House than that which they before agreed to. I submit the report to the House with the explanation I have made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask my colleague whether the House is to understand the action now proposed to be taken on the subject of tax upon whisky will bind the House as a finality? I ask whether it binds the House, or, on the contrary, leaves the whole subject open for discussion and action hereafter upon the general tax bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. I answer my colleague that we throw the whole subject open for general legislation. The introduction of anything on the subject here was at the earnest solicitation of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. We have not yet secured what is wanted, but have provided so much for some bad cases now existing, especially in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee of Ways and Means, then, intend to report a complete and harmonious bill hereafter on the subject of whisky?

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill will be harmonious, but I cannot say how far the House will be when it comes to hear it. [Laughter.] We have in the general tax bill, which we have in part prepared, entire sections relating to this subject. We intend to propose entirely new legislation in regard to distilled spirits, and to move it as part of the general tax bill to the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether this last section in reference to compromise and discontinuance of any prosecution under this act will apply to claims for drawback in the Department?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot possibly see how it can. There is no such thing as a prosecution in reference to drawbacks. It refers to preceding sections, where prosecutions are provided for against distillers and officers for bad conduct.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It relates to prosecutions.

Mr. SCHENCK. Criminal prosecutions.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I have no objection to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. When a prosecution is once commenced it is required to be gone through with.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am satisfied with it.

Mr. PAINE. I see, Mr. Speaker, that the conference committee propose to tax "the manufacturers of all merchandise, breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber excepted." I cannot understand how unmanufactured lumber can be manufactured merchandise, and I ask for some explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the reason for it is, if I may be permitted to disclose without naming names, this: we could not get an agreement on it without some such exceptions, the lumber interest and the breadstuff interest being represented in the committee and very generally in the House and Senate. The lumber interest seemed to be satisfied that this was all they could get.

Mr. MULLINS rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let me finish the answer I am now making. It is understood to be unmanufactured lumber when it is turned out of the saw mill in the shape of boards, joists, laths, &c. It becomes manufactured when dressed for making sashes, doors, windows, &c. That distinction is drawn in the bill between what is manufactured and unmanufactured lumber.

Mr. MULLINS. The latter explanation in regard to lumber has satisfied me. I was unapprised in regard to what the gentleman thought about the lumber region.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that I can make any explanation clearer than I have made it to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] who again calls my attention to the subject of manufactured and unmanufactured lumber. As I understand the matter from those more familiar with it than I am, the making up or changing the shape of lumber which is already made lumber out of logs is the manufacture of lumber. In the rough it is unmanufactured lumber.

Mr. MULLINS. Of course that is obliged to be the meaning. The manufacture of lumber is supposed to mean the changing of lumber already on hand into a different thing.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe it is as comprehensible now as it can be. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. FERRY. Mr. Speaker, as my name appears appended to the report I desire to say to the House that, as a member of the conference committee, I was anxious to secure the exemption of all manufactures that had heretofore appeared on the free list. But, as was said by the chairman of the conference committee, it was impossible to accomplish this desirable result. We therefore took up with what we could get; in other words, with half a loaf rather than lose the whole.

I desire here to state that, in view of the phraseology expressed within the brackets—"unmanufactured lumber excepted"—the question arose in the discussion upon this topic whether this phraseology would include all forms of lumber converted into other articles, and I think I do not mistake the views of the committee (such, at least, were mine) in saying that the expression excludes all kinds of lumber that have taken such other forms as to be named and designated by other specific terms than lumber. For instance, furniture is manufactured lumber. So is a desk or a bureau, sofas, chairs, book-cases, or any other article of the kind, as well as doors and sashes. They lose the designation of lumber when so formed and so combined as to be specifically known by some other name. I wish it to be understood at this time that this is the turning-point of construction. The exception applies to all forms of lumber, whether in the rough or not, that do not take other forms expressed through a peculiar mode of construction, by which the form and idea of lumber are merged into another specific, readily and naturally known and named as such by all. Lumber continues to be known as such so long as it retains its distinctive features. When its characteristics so far change by being transformed into another form by shape and combination, so as to serve substantially a different purpose as a specific and recognized article of merchandise, that moment it ceases to be unmanufactured lumber and becomes manufactured lumber, or rather merges into the name of the kind of article formed and designed, as I understand the meaning of the terms employed.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether boards that have been manufactured in a planing-mill and plowed with a groove for flooring are manufactured lumber.

Mr. FERRY. I understand that flooring or ceiling is planed and grooved lumber. It is lumber used as such, and cannot be known or construed into any other article but lumber. The terms flooring and ceiling are merely descriptive of different articles of lumber and not names of other articles of merchandise.

Mr. BLAINE. How about doors and sashes?

Mr. FERRY. These are manufactured lumber, in my judgment, and are not considered as included in the exception at all, for the simple reason illustrated by my remarks, that the idea of lumber, by the new form and construction, has been lost in the specifics "door and sash."

Mr. PIKE. Under the decision of the Treasury Department in relation to this matter, the phraseology used in the reciprocity treaty being "lumber, unmanufactured in whole or in part," which came in free, shingles that were shaved did not come in free, but were taxed, while laths that were sawed came in free and boards came in free. But shaved lumber, planed lumber, and finished articles, such as doors, sashes, blinds, and articles of that kind, did not come in free. If the committee had used that phraseology it would have been familiar at the Treasury Department. I suppose this phraseology used by the committee would be taken to be like that used in the reciprocity treaty, and in consequence of the decision under that treaty.

Mr. HALSEY. The ruling of the Department under the present law is that sawing and planing of lumber, tonguing and grooving of boards, and grinding of breadstuffs are not considered manufactures.

Mr. FERRY. The gentleman has answered for me, and I wish here to state, in further explanation of this construction, that whenever any flooring and ceiling or any planed lumber of any kind is shipped to market it is always described as "lumber" and not especially as "flooring" or "planed lumber." It all goes by the title of lumber, whether in the rough or manufactured. Manifests of cargoes frequently designate different qualities, as common, first, second, and third uppers, irrespective of whether the cargoes are composed of boards, scantling, flooring, siding, or clearstuff, and, whether planed or unplanned, the whole goes to market under the general term of lumber. When, however, doors or laths or shingles are shipped, they are designated in the bill of lading or manifest as such, whether sawed or shaved shingles. They are not and cannot be by any perversion of construction called manufactured lumber. They ceased to be lumber when they by different form became lath and shingles.

If I understand this exception—and I was present during the discussion in the committee—it applies only to that kind of manufacture of lumber which converts it into different materials by which it is thereafter designated and known as a specific article of commerce.

Mr. Speaker, to be more explicit, and in hopes to clear up the confusion of ideas with which gentlemen seem inclined to encircle this question of phraseology, I may say that in the committee of conference I had the honor to move the amendment excepting breadstuffs, lumber, shingles, and lath, and believing that I reveal nothing that took place in committee more than is proper for the elucidation of this matter, I may also say that "shingles and lath" were strenuously objected to, the committee consenting to the exemption of lumber, but unwilling to include sawed or shaved shingles or lath. They reluctantly assented to lumber, but would not open the door to further exemptions. The question then arose whether the term lumber would cover all articles of different names made of that article and of various combinations of that material. To guard against this the qualifying term unmanufactured was offered by a member of the committee and adopted. Its purpose was to cut off all articles that by the processes of manufacture had been transformed into such definitive characteristics as to be generally known, accepted, and named by some other more specific term than the general dismissed one of lumber. The distinction, I think, is very clearly settled when you attempt to consider the names of articles synonymous or interchangeable. Shingles are not lumber nor lath; lath is not shingles or lumber any more than lumber is either shingles or lath. They all may have been logs, and have sprung from trees. Because of their common origin they are not to be necessarily of like nomenclature, after undergoing various processes of manufacture, by which their form, characteristics, and use are materially changed. Nor am I to be diverted or answered by the statement in my hearing that unmanufactured lumber or shingles or lath are logs. Manufactured logs may be either lumber, lath, or shingles; but the reverse cannot be true. Unmanufactured shingles or lath or lumber are not nor cannot be logs. They cannot possibly be both. As well might it be said that unmanufactured lumber, shingles, and lath are standing trees, while it can correctly be said that manufactured trees may be lath, shingles, or lumber.

Let me further state in answer to the gentleman who, attempting to draw the line of discrimination, said that unmanufactured lumber is such material as falls from the first process of manufacture, and that manufactured lumber is of that which follows second and more processes of manufacture; that one process of manufacture does not necessarily make either lumber, laths, or shingles. I would remind gentlemen that in the manufacture of either of those articles more processes than one are required to perfect each. All may spring from logs, as they generally do. For instance, logs taken from a common boom at the foot of your mill-slide are taken one way, sawn and split by two processes into bolts, then sawn into imperfect shingles, and again by the fourth process edged into the perfect shingle, thus ceasing to be a log by becoming manufactured into a shingle. Logs taken from the same boom are drawn another way into the saw-mill and first slabbed in whole or in part. These slabs, by a second sawing, are cut into the requisite length, and by a third and fourth sawing, or process, made into manufactured laths, thus losing the title of log to take the name of lath. The slabbed log, by a second sawing, is converted into imperfect lumber, by a third edged into perfected lumber, and may again be planed, tongued, and grooved for finishing purposes or for flooring or ceiling, and all the while be nothing else than lumber. It will be seen, therefore, that processes of manufacture, or degrees of form, finish, or quality, cannot be the distinctive line of severance between the characteristics of lumber to determine the construction of the term "unmanufactured lumber," as submitted by the conference committee, and now under consideration. Without, therefore, going beyond legislative proprieties, or in any way assuming to state what were the views of, or to commit the members of the conference committee to any particular basis of construction, I can properly state my conviction of the true intent or import of the words "unmanufactured lumber" by declaring it to mean, in my judgment, all sorts, kinds, forms, finish, and qualities of lumber as have not by further manufacture and other combinations and forms passed into such construction as to lose the palpable conditions of lumber by transformation into the shape of some specifically known article of use and merchandise by which it is generally and invariably named.

Mr. Speaker, much as I regret the failure to include in this exemption from taxation all manufactured articles heretofore ranged under the free list, I am content with the inclusion of breadstuffs and lumber. These, of the many articles taxed, are, perhaps, the proper ones to be free of taxation if only two can be saved. It harmonizes with the theory of that legislation which generously grants a free homestead to the poor settler who, for want of means, would otherwise roam homeless and a wanderer throughout the land. Freeing lumber from taxation lessens its cost and cheapens the shelter of the homestead. Releasing breadstuffs from taxation reduces the cost of the primal food of the primal poverty-stricken settler. With a free home, a free shelter, and free food, the staple and necessary conditions of livelihood are protected and the poorer classes of the community befriended by a considerate Government. With such protection and such a start in life failure to rise above the misfortunes which hover around the more dependent classes of citizenship must be chargeable to personal inefficiency rather than to legislative magnanimity. I trust the report of the conference committee will receive the concurrence of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.]

Mr. MYERS. I believe the House has been fully enlightened on this question of lumber, and I only rise to say that I hope we shall come to a vote at once, and that the report will be adopted. What we desire to do is to relieve the industrial interests of the country from a burden no longer necessary to be imposed on them, and it was not intended at this time to perfect a general tax bill.

Some gentlemen object that certain articles are exempted and others not. They will be taken care of, I presume, in the general revenue bill whenever justice requires it.

Other gentlemen wish that the provisions in regard to whisky had been made more stringent. I hope that before long we shall have a new system to facilitate the collection of the whisky tax, that of levying this tax upon the fermenting capacity of the distilleries, by which I have no doubt fraud can be largely prevented, and $100,000,000 revenue raised from this source. We have before us a good bill, the best that could be obtained, and, notwithstanding what was suggested yesterday by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] one which will relieve the laboring men as well as the manufacturers of the country. I hope we shall come to a vote, and finally pass the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK resumed the floor.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to ask my colleague whether the fourth section of this bill will have the effect of placing upon the tax list, at two mills on the dollar, all the agricultural implements which are to be manufactured and which were exempted from taxation by the bill last year?

Mr. SCHENCK. Of course manufacturers of agricultural implements, like other manufacturers, will pay the two mills tax on their annual sales above $5,000.

There are no exceptions made but the two named, breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber. And, by the way, I will here remark that there is a pretty strong disposition always in the House—and it is very natural, too—to pay court to farmers and others who have votes, by taking the tax off agricultural implements and everything of that kind supposed to be used by the laboring classes. Well, we tried that experiment last year. We took the tax off all plows and harrows and reaping machines and mowing machines; and what has been the consequence? No farmer has got his agricultural implements one cent cheaper, but the manufacturers have made some gains by the increase of their profits from this source. And so it would probably be again, should we attempt any competition in a race of that sort.

We have endeavored to equalize taxes by spreading them over the whole community, making the tax exceedingly low, only two mills, and that only upon the amount of annual sales in excess of $5,000, and making no exceptions but those to which we agreed in the committee of conference for the sake of compromise.

Now, one word in regard to this subject of manufactured lumber. It is not proper that I should permit what was said by my colleague on the committee of conference [Mr. FERRY] to go to the country without expressing my dissent from some of his conclusions. I think there is a misunderstanding between him and other gentlemen on the committee in this. He supposes that the committee, after full discussion and consideration, settled upon some definition of the phrase "unmanufactured lumber." I do not so understand. If I were to give my individual opinion I would say that boards, when they are planed for flooring or ceiling, have gone through another process after they have left the saw-mill and have become manufactured lumber. In that I would, perhaps, disagree with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

If I were Commissioner of Internal Revenue I would hold the meaning of the phrase "unmanufactured lumber" to be simply this: as we understand manufactured corn to be corn converted into whisky or something else, so manufactured lumber is lumber in the rough converted into something else. In other words, I hold it to be unmanufactured lumber when it leaves the saw-mill, and that it becomes manufactured lumber when it goes through any other process. But these opinions of mine are not binding upon anybody.

Mr. PIKE. How about laths?

Mr. SCHENCK. Those I suppose have not gone through any second process. Any lumber that has not gone through a second process of manufacture I hold to be unmanufactured lumber; and I would so decide if I were Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

I want this to be distinctly understood: there has been no construction put upon this provision of the bill by any assent of mine which is to be hereafter binding upon any Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Treasury Department. We adopted the language of the gentleman who desired unmanufactured lumber to be exempted. That phrase is one which I think is entirely comprehensible, and I am willing to leave it for consideration hereafter.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish it distinctly understood that in the judgment of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means unmanufactured lumber is lumber in the condition in which it leaves the saw-mill or in the first remove from logs.

Mr. SCHENCK. Considering my relation to the subject, I have no objection to repeating briefly what I, as one of the conferees, understood unmanufactured lumber to be. I suppose that when lumber leaves the saw-mill, when shingles leave the cleaver by which they are made, when only one process has been gone through with to convert it from a log into lumber, it is then unmanufactured lumber; but whenever it reaches or goes through a second process of any character, for instance, passing through a planing-mill or a dressing-machine or a sawing-machine, and is converted into smaller kinds of lumber, fancy lumber, then it becomes manufactured lumber.

Several members rose to ask questions.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the Chair will decide which one of the gentlemen who are addressing me is entitled to the floor I will yield, but not otherwise. I have the floor, and when I yield to gentlemen I will say so. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to ask the gentleman a practical question, one in which many people in my State are interested. The process of making shingles is not exactly a single process, as the gentleman from Ohio has stated. It involves two distinct operations: first, the logs are cut by a cross-cut saw, and then the blocks are carried to the shingle saws and the shingles are there completed. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, under this conference report, shingles are exempted from this tax?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not as learned in shingles as these gentlemen from Wisconsin and Michigan, and other places in the Northwest. I do not know that I have anything to add to what I have already said to the House. According to my poor comprehension when all that has been done which is needed to make a shingle a shingle, in the rough if you may call it, it is unmanufactured lumber, but go a step further and put a fancy touch on it, and then it becomes manufactured lumber.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. BLAINE rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am attacked by my colleague in the rear and by the dictionary on the left, but I give precedence to my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. What my colleague is now saying will be drawn into an interpretation of this law when it becomes the law. I wish to know, therefore, when, according to his idea, shingles become manufactured lumber? He says when shingles pass out from under the knife they are in the condition of unmanufactured lumber. Suppose that shingle goes on through, I should like to know at what point it ceases to be unmanufactured and becomes manufactured lumber?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is hard to go through a cross-examination on the subject of lumber, not having been educated in that line; but according to the best of my ability I will answer my colleague. Ordinarily I do not know that the shingles we use out in the West require any additional process in order to make them suitable for putting upon our houses. In New Jersey and Long Island they get them up in fanciful styles with scalloped butts and use them as weather-boards for their houses. In that way they may convert them into manufactured lumber. I suppose if they are planed, jointed, or butted, and subjected to other processes they might be considered as manufactured lumber, but I will not enter into that question. I am not called upon to do it. I now yield to "Mr. Webster."

Mr. BLAINE. The definition of my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is sustained by "Webster." He says lumber is "timber sawed or split for use, as beams, joists, boards, planks, staves, hoops, and the like."

Mr. SCHENCK. I am happy to find myself backed up by "Webster."

Mr. PIKE. We should consider this to be what it means under the language of the treaty, "lumber manufactured in whole or in part."

Mr. SCHENCK. The House does not make treaties, and I prefer to have it construed as a statute and not as a treaty; and if the construction happens to be the same in both cases I shall be satisfied.

Now, before submitting this question, I wish to make a remark on another subject, which I hope will not lead to any excitement among gentlemen. I go back to that part of the bill which relates to whisky and distilled spirits for just one purpose. The Committee of Ways and Means are exceedingly anxious to get a rigorous, stringent whisky law, which shall punish those who are guilty of infraction of it, whether they be tax-payers who are seducing officers to commit fraud, or officers who are seducing tax-payers or conniving with them that frauds may be committed on the revenue. In the course of their labors they may often make mistakes. They have in this bill attempted to accommodate themselves to the wishes of the Department in having made provision for an emergent difficulty.

The other day there was a debate on this subject. We are accustomed to have our motives impugned. All the distillers howl at us for the attempt that we are making, as they suppose, to oppress them. Many distillers who are not distillers, but who get excited on the subject howl at us upon the supposition that we are in some way playing into the hands of the whisky ring. Now, until our labor appears and is closed up, I am willing to set one of these things off against the other. They do not concern me. I do not think the equanimity of any member of the committee is disturbed by these outside commentaries. But, when a commentary is made by one who may be considered in some sense as officially connected with this House, I think it proper to direct attention to it, with the expression of a hope that it may not occur again.

We have admitted here on the floor a gentleman to report for the Associated Press. His reports are also those which go into the Daily Chronicle of this city. In the debate which took place the other day I find that, not content with confining himself to reporting what was said in the House, he reports his own conclusions also, or gives intimation of his own opinions upon the subject as the debate goes on. Speaking of what took place on that occasion, I find the reporter of the Associated Press, and for the Daily Chronicle, holds this language:

"Various other questions were put by Mr. VAN WYCK, Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, Mr. BOWWELL, Mr. BENTON, and others, and were replied to by Mr. SCHENCK, but no explanation was asked or given as to what public advantage it is to be to compel fraudulent distillers and whisky dealers to exact larger profits than they do at present."

That is the reporter's remark, he being of opinion that the effect if not the object of the bill was to play into the hands of the distillers and fraudulent persons to increase their profits. Nothing was said in the discussion on that point. I allude to it now simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that the reporter of the Associated Press nor any other reporter should undertake to interpolate his opinion either on one side or the other into the account which he undertakes to give of the debates and proceedings of this House, and to say—for I am very candid in this matter—with the kindest feelings toward that reporter, as well as others connected with our proceedings here, that if anything of the kind occurs again I shall feel it my duty to bring it before the House for action.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about calling the previous question, but I will yield.

Mr. BAKER. I observe that one of the provisions of the bill upon which the penalties of fine and imprisonment attach is in these words:

"Or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return."

I suppose the meaning is shall knowingly or intentionally do this thing. It is usual in penal laws to provide that if the thing is done knowingly or intentionally the penalty shall apply.

Mr. SCHENCK. That would be my construction, and the word "false" is used with a view of conveying, as I understand, that meaning. I will now call the previous question, because there is barely time to go through with the vote on this report by ayes and noes, if they should be demanded.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Only for a question, and it must be brief.

Mr. HUNTER. I see that the fifth section of this bill provides for the forfeiture of certain articles used for distilling when the distilling is carried on in violation of law. I would ask the gentleman why the committee did not go further and provide for the forfeiture of the real estate on which the distillery is carried on?

Mr. SCHENCK. For the simple reason that we are now, at the request of the Department, passing a temporary law on the subject. We shall report a law on that subject which I think will be quite as stringent as the gentleman wishes, but we are now only dealing out milk for babes. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRADE WITH THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, information as to the trade between the United States and the British North American Provinces since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred under the law to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the resolution of the House asking for information in reference to the trade between the United States and the British North American Provinces since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, be printed for the use of the House.

COMMISSIONS ON SALES OF BONDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the resolution of the House, relative to commissions paid on sales of bonds, to whom paid, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. PRICE for three weeks.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. BENJAMIN on account of the serious illness of his wife.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

On motion of Mr. LAFLIN, an order was made for the printing of the written statements, letters, and documents, proved and read to the commission whose report is found in House Document No. 22, second session Fortieth Congress, together with any other communications on the same subject, either in the hands of the commission or of the officers of the War Department.

PROTECTION OF EMIGRANTS AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is not often that I ask to introduce a bill or to have one printed, but I have here a bill for the better protection of emigrants and passengers. It is a bill of great importance, and it is desirable to have it early considered by the Committee on Commerce. I therefore ask leave to introduce it and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to ask the gentleman if they are going to report anything from the Committee on Commerce this session?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That will depend on whether the committee is called for reports or not.

The SPEAKER. It will soon be called, when reports of committees are in order.

No objection being made,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 999) for the better protection of emigrants and passengers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent that the committee be allowed to report that bill back at any time after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not ask that.

Mr. PIKE. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The House ought to allow a bill of that importance to be reported back at any time.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope no bill will be reported back from that committee before the committee is called regularly for reports. I have several bills which I desire to bring before the House at an early day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, the gentleman can object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] objects, and the request is not granted.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BUTLER.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution; upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House five thousand copies of the opening address of Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, one of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives on the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, before the Senate, with the accompanying brief of law authorities, and forty thousand copies without the accompanying brief.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to ask the gentleman what it will cost to print this Republican campaign document?

Mr. LAFLIN. It will cost somewhere from fifteen hundred to two thousand dollars.

Mr. BROOKS. What I want to ask the gentleman is, if he intends hereafter impartially, in like manner, in like way, in like numbers, to have printed all the speeches on both sides; those of all the managers on the part of the House and of all the counsel for the President?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the precise condition of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I want an answer to my question.

Mr. LAFLIN. I can simply state in reference to that, that I have no power to bind the House of Representatives. I do not speak in the name of the House of Representatives. In offering this resolution I do not offer any report in reference to the address or speech of any particular member of the House of Representatives or any one of the counsel of the President. It is simply a resolution in reference to the argument of an officer of the House of Representatives. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] can convince me that the counsel of the President are in the same category with the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and that it is the duty of the House of Representatives to print their speeches in the same way that it is proposed to print the speeches of those acting for the House, he certainly will find me with him.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman does not answer my question directly.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want some further explanation of this resolution before I can vote for it. We are now about to establish a precedent, and we must deal fairly and justly on all sides in this matter. I hope the resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. ROSS. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] think it is quite fair to tax the people of this country for printing Republican campaign documents?

Mr. LAFLIN. I give as close attention as I possibly can to what is said on the other side of the House, but there is so much confusion here that I cannot understand what is said.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it intended to publish this simply as an electioneering document? Or is it for the purpose of furnishing the country with information in regard to the proceedings in the court of impeachment? If the latter object be the one in view, then I suppose the proper way would be to publish all the proceedings, so that the people may have a fair understanding of the whole subject.

Mr. LAFLIN. I have not placed myself here for the purpose of being catechised; I am perfectly willing to answer proper questions. But such questions as are now being asked me I must respectfully decline to answer. I now demand the previous question.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 900) to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HALSEY asked and obtained leave of absence for one week.

CONSTITUTION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. PAINE. I move that the constitution of Florida, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, be printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BUTLER.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon seconding the previous question upon the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing in reference to the argument of Mr. BUTLER.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAFLIN and Mr. CHANLER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 73, noes 24.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 82, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Delos B. Ashley, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, Marshall, Niblack, Phelps, Poland, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Stone, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, and Woodbridge—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnel, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Hawkins, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kitchen, Ladin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsey, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Stokes, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Artell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Benton, Bingham, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Donnelly, Ela, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Getz, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Lynch, McCormick, McCullough, Miller, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Tabor, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—70.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER then said: The hour of half past twelve o'clock has now arrived, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At six o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has adjourned until twelve o'clock tomorrow.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at six o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. COBURN: A memorial of the members of Post No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, district of Indiana, asking that a bronze medal be presented by the United States to each honorably discharged soldier and sailor and officer of the Army and Navy in the war of the rebellion.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

of the Journal would be dispensed with if there should be no objection.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. URSON indefinitely.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At five o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted for ten days each to Mr. POMEROY, Mr. LAFLIN, Mr. ARNELL, and Mr. DRIGGS.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at three minutes past five o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary.

ADMISSION TO IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call up the motion I submitted the other day, and I propose to modify it in the form in which I send it to the chair; and I hope we shall have a vote without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio, as modified, will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That after to-morrow the order of the 15th of March ultimo, relative to admission to the gallery, be suspended until further order; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate shall take special care that order shall be observed in the galleries during the trial of the impeachment now pending, and he is hereby authorized to arrest and bring before the Senate any person who violates the orders of the Senate; and he shall take effective measures to secure admission to the diplomatic gallery, the ladies' gallery, and the reporters' gallery, to those only who are entitled to admission thereto under the rules.

Mr. HOWARD. From what time is that to take effect?

Mr. SHERMAN. After to-morrow.

Mr. RAMSEY. Why not make it apply after to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. Tickets for to-morrow are already out.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt the expediency of making the change as broadly as is proposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us try it for a day or two.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to suggest an amendment that this should be tried on alternate days. ["Oh, no."] On one day let the galleries be opened as they have been usually, and then, on the other day, try the ticket system.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the people who come here do not behave themselves as well as the ladies and gentlemen who have attended our sittings I shall be perfectly willing to go back to the present system; but let us try the free system for a while.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope that the rule will not be altered at all. The rule we have is a good one and it operates well. We have order and quiet, which we shall not have if we change it. All we can do is to have the galleries filled by the public, and they are filled now under the present rule. The distribution of tickets is equal; the Representatives and Senators have an opportunity of making that distribution as equal as possible; so that it is much more just to the public than that only those should get here who are willing to come and stay three or four hours or make a rush to get in. So, as to the rights of the public, they are not infringed upon at all by the present rule. And when we have a rule which has been adopted and which operates well, has been tested, I think there is great impropriety in departing from it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 15; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 2, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The SPEAKER. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings being only a record of the meeting and adjournment of the House, its reading will be dispensed with if there be no objection.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. VAN TRUMP for ten days; and to Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. HILL, Mr. MOORHEAD, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE indefinitely.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. MCCLURG, from the Committee of Elections, presented the minority report in the case of Switzler against Anderson; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed with the majority report in the same case.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Before the House proceeds, Mr. Speaker, to the bar of the Senate I wish to submit a proposition, to which, I think, there will be no objection. I move, by unanimous consent, that, unless the Speaker shall intimate there will be business to be transacted after the adjournment of the Senate sitting for the trial of the President, it shall be the understanding that nothing shall be done, so that members shall not feel themselves obliged to remain here hour after hour waiting the return of the House from the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. When and how shall the Speaker give us such intimation? Shall it be in the morning?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir; in the morning, before the House proceeds to the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think that entirely agreeable, provided we have the intimation in the morning before the House proceeds to the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should have stated that, for such is my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois proposes that unless the Speaker, or some member of the House, shall notify the House, before it proceeds to the Senate, that business shall be taken up, it shall be the understanding that no business shall be transacted that day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should prefer to have it limited, for as the Speaker states the proposition any member of the House might, I will not say officiously, state that he wanted to call up business and compel the members to remain in constant attendance as at present. I want it left to the Speaker to make the intimation each morning.

The SPEAKER. It will be limited to the Speaker, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope that proposition will be adopted.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to what I believe to be a question of order. It seems to be the object of the House in proceeding each day to the bar of the Senate to try to make an impression upon the Senate and the country. I suppose that everything appertaining to the matter of impeachment is to be considered as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The House has resolved that each day at twelve o'clock the House will proceed to the bar of the Senate. If the gentleman gives notice that he has a motion to submit after the return of the House this afternoon the Chair will so notify members.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to give notice that at some time I shall move that the Clerk of this House shall provide, to be paid for out of the contingent fund, for some kind of uniform or badge of honor or red feather for the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to wear when he goes to the Senate. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana is serious in giving notice that business may be expected on the return of the House from the Senate the Chair, in accordance with the order of the House, will now give such intimation.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Indiana does not give notice that any business may be expected this afternoon on the return of the House from the Senate.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not give any such notice if it will make any session this evening. What I desired was to have the proposition considered now. I think, however, our chairman ought to have something to distinguish him from the rest of us as he marches at the head of the House to the bar of the Senate. Besides, I am sure he would be more impressive.

WISCONSIN RIVER VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin River Valley railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

BRIDGE AT COUNCIL BLUFFS.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented the preamble and joint resolutions of the State of Iowa, relative to the construction of a drawbridge across the Missouri river at Council Bluffs; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock has now arrived, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Door-keeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At five o'clock and three minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of citizens of Maryland, for the passage of House bill No. 470, to incorporate the Washington and Maryland Railroad Company.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 3, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As no legislative business is in order, the chair will be vacated that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may preside over the Senate organized for the trial of the impeachment.

The President pro tempore thereupon vacated the chair, and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at five o'clock and eight minutes p. m.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 30th of March, signed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 350) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," approved March 3, 1817;

A bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Shunk;

A bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Henry Greathouse and Samuel Kelley; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 122) for the relief of the heirs of Major A. L. Brewer, late a paymaster in the United States Army.

REPORTER OF ASSOCIATED PRESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate take up the order which I offered the other day authorizing the Presiding Officer to assign a place on the floor to the reporter of the Associated Press.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT OFFICER. The proposed resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 25th of March:

Resolved, That the Presiding Officer be authorized to admit to a seat on the floor the reporter of the New York Associated Press during the trial of the impeachment.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution which has been read.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I moved an adjournment because I am exceedingly opposed to the order which is proposed to be adopted. I do not think the Senate ought to grant the permission to the reporter of the Associated Press, which is asked for by the Senator from Rhode Island, and moved for in his order. The Associated Press is represented by its reporters in many other legislative and deliberative bodies besides the Congress of the United States, and the reports of the Associated Press from many other deliberative bodies have been and are systematic libels upon the principles, the policy, and the conduct of the friends of the majority in this body. The agents of the Associated Press, reporting the deliberations of constitutional conventions now sitting and heretofore sitting in many of the States, have systematically libeled those conventions and their members, and unless those who have the control of that institution shall prevent such reports as have emanated from those agents I think we ought not, in justice to ourselves and the principles and policy that we represent, to permit an agent of that association upon the floor of this Senate on the present occasion.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised at the statement made by the honorable Senator from Connecticut; but I am still more surprised by the application he makes of that statement. This is not a question of favoritism to the Associated Press.

Mr. HOWARD. Entirely so.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of the Senator. My constituents are compelled to rely upon the reports of the Associated Press, be those reports better or worse, for the information they get from day to day touching this trial. Now, sir, what is this proposition, and what are the circumstances that gave rise to it? We sit here in this Senate Chamber, limited as its dimensions are, and we commence by the adoption of a rule which excludes from it everybody except that select few to whom tickets are given. The trial goes on, and the reporter of the Associated Press occupies a place in the gallery from which we are informed it is impossible for him to catch from the mouths of witnesses, only half audible as they are, many answers that are given. And then, when a proposition is made that this reporter be permitted to draw so near the witnesses that he can truly and fully give to that great public which reads the eight hundred and forty papers, supplied, as I am told by the Associated Press, the question is raised whether some other reporter in some other place, connected with this association, has given or has not given a fair and truthful statement of the proceedings which there took place.

Now, I submit with great deference to the Senator from Michigan, who says that this is a matter of favoritism, that, if it be, it is favoritism to the whole people of the State of New York, for example; it is for their benefit more especially that I am speaking; and it is favoritism to the people of every other State where newspapers are circulated and where an intense interest is felt in this trial, and an intense interest in all the details of the trial, and where the people must depend upon those sounds which cannot be caught in the reporter's gallery.

Now, sir, I should like to know by what system of reasoning it is that we, in the first place, under a supposed necessity, are to exclude the public at large from the galleries and admit upon tickets such as are selected to come here, and, then, we are to arrange the situation of the trial in such way that one single person, (because that is all the resolution implies,) who alone is the medium of detailed communication with the whole public, is not to be permitted to be in such contact with the proceedings that he can make that communication full. I do not know, for my own part, to which reporter it is that this privilege is to be given; I mean I do not know the name of the reporter; but I understand it is to be given to some one who is to report for the whole of this association, communicating, as I am told, with eight hundred and forty papers, with the whole country, so that to all these eight hundred and forty papers and all that countless multitude which no man can number reading these eight hundred and forty papers, is to be extended the "favoritism" of allowing one single chair to be occupied within the limits of convenient hearing.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator from New York will give way, I will move to postpone the consideration of the present resolution for the purpose of taking up that offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to repeal the present ticket system.

Mr. CONKLING. As it will take but a moment to vote on this I beg the Senate to let us vote squarely on it, because I may suggest to the honorable Senator when we have repealed, if we shall repeal, the resolution in reference to the galleries, that will not at all relieve this difficulty, but will increase it, because there will be more buzz in the galleries, and then the public who rely upon these reports, and look at these reports made by the Associated Press reporter, will be no better off than it is now. Therefore I beg the Senate to allow us to take the vote on this proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, if it were possible—

Mr. RAMSEY. Do I understand the Senator from New York does not give way to this motion?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall pass both propositions before we adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it were possible I would give to the reporters of all the papers a place upon the floor, but that is entirely out of the question, and, therefore, I have moved to give it to the reporter who represents the larger number of papers, very much the larger number. The reports of the proceedings of the Senate are taken almost wholly from the Associated Press, and the question is whether we shall have those reports as accurate and as full as possible. I have inquired into the matter, and I am satisfied that from the gallery it is not practicable to hear the testimony of witnesses as they are examined here upon the stand, and the result is that the reports must be in some degree imperfect and inaccurate; and then the broad complaints which have been made against the Associated Press are raised.

Mr. CONNESS. There has been no complaint since the trial began.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have had more experience, perhaps, than most of my associates of this body as to the exceeding difficulty of making satisfactory reports. Now, the Associated Press comprehends papers all over the country, without any reference whatever to their politics. The papers upon both sides, and the extreme papers upon both sides, are represented equally in this association; and if there should be a systematic, regular misrepresentation of our proceedings in the interest of one party or the other complaint would be made from the papers representing the other party, and it would be prevented and broken up, as it ought to be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from Rhode Island how this association is formed, and whether all the newspapers can come in if they please, or whether it is a close corporation that admits persons upon certain conditions which are pretty heavy? What is the nature of the association?

Mr. FERRY. I can answer that question. The Associated Press that seeks to come on this floor consists of seven newspapers of the city of New York.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps I can answer the question a little more fully than my friend from Connecticut, because I have had the misfortune to suffer considerably from this Associated Press in matters that are not proper to be brought into this place. The Associated Press consists of all the daily papers of New York; I think all of them; all the principal ones, at any rate; in fact, no paper can live there unless it belongs to the Associated Press, and that Associated Press takes the reports, takes the news from all parts of the country and from all parts of the world, and sells it to the newspapers of every other part of the country.

Mr. CONKLING. How many in all?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know how many.

Mr. CONKLING. Eight hundred and forty, I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. But I think no paper out of the city of New York that desires to have the reports of the Associated Press is refused.

Mr. JOHNSON. They pay for them.

Mr. ANTHONY. They pay their price. Their price is not very extravagant.

Mr. JOHNSON. They make money by it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The price is reasonable.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe all the daily papers and all the papers in the country can have their reports.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I am misinformed. I ought to know; but perhaps I am mistaken.

Mr. FERRY. How many papers are in the Association?

Mr. ANTHONY. All the daily papers in New York, I believe.

Mr. FERRY. Only seven.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well. I understand the Associated Press refuses to receive into its Association new daily papers, which I think is wrong. I think it creates a monopoly, which I do not defend at all.

Mr. FERRY. Do you not know that they have refused to admit new daily papers in New York?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand they have refused to admit a new daily paper there, and in that I think they have done wrong; but that is a question which I do not think we are to go into. There are local associations in various parts of the country which have the same restrictive and monopolizing provisions that the Associated Press of New York has, that no new paper shall come into their associations unless by the consent of those already in; but the Associated Press of New York sells its news to the press of the whole country, subject to any restrictions which the local press associations may make.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator from Rhode Island is through, I should like to make a motion to postpone the present matter for the purpose of considering the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know why the Senator from Minnesota supposes the Senator from Rhode Island is through.

Mr. CONKLING and others. Let us have a vote on this.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It does not seem to me that there ought to be any difference of opinion on a question like this. It is well known to every Senator here that if the country has to depend upon the Globe for the report of this trial it will get no information on the subject. The only opportunity of getting information from day to day is through the Associated Press, whatever faults it may have; and I never had heard the objection that is made by the Senator from Connecticut. I had supposed that the Democrats were the men who had occasion to complain of this association. I had supposed it was controlled by party politics to a very considerable extent. I have never examined with a view to ascertain it.

I know that I was made to appear very stupid in some remarks that I had occasion to make some time since. I did not care much about it, however; and I am not going to vote here upon any consideration of that sort. I think that this Associated Press intends to give to the great New York journals very nearly verbatim the proceedings of this trial; and if the report should not go in verbatim to any other papers than the New York journals, that of itself would go a great way to inform the country. The journals of New York go to all the villages of the Northwest, as well as all the great cities, and are read by the mass of the people; and then from these journals, as well as directly from the Associated Press, it goes into all the local journals. I think it is of great importance; and as a matter of public duty I should vote for this resolution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My dignity or sense of dignity as a Senator is no more offended by the representative of the Associated Press sitting on the floor than it is by his sitting in the gallery. I do not see any difference at all. It is a mere matter of convenience. The witnesses do not speak quite as loud as Senators do when they speak in addressing the Senate; and therefore, simply for the convenience of the reporter, I am perfectly willing that he shall sit here and take a report.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very evident that there are a good many speeches to be made on this subject, and we cannot get a vote to-night. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not. I hope we shall settle this question now.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 19.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senate will allow me, I have a suggestion to make. I suggest that the Senate adjourn now until half-past ten o'clock to-morrow. ["No!" "No!"] I suppose some Senators are hungry for dinner. I have not that weakness.

Mr. CONKLING. No; let us vote on this question now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to adjourn the Senator from California demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. Can the yeas and nays be demanded after the vote has been declared? The Chair distinctly declared it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They can be demanded after the result has been declared by the sound or after a division.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, McCreey, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Williams—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, and Wade—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Drake, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—15.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING and others. Question!

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to the Senator from New York for calling for the question after he has made a very handsome speech and feeling satisfied that enough has been said on the subject; but, inasmuch as I wish to explain the ground upon which I shall vote against this resolution, I must ask his patience—I am sure everybody else will grant it to me—to hear me. I have no fault to find with the Associated Press, so far as it has treated me. It has done me more justice than I am entitled to, I do not doubt. The ground upon which I vote against permitting their agent to take notes on the floor is that it extends a privilege to that close corporation of associated newspapers—who, I admit, have the perfect right to associate if they please, and upon terms to suit them—that other newspapers who are equally worthy cannot have; and therefore it is that I am opposed to extending a privilege of this kind to one set of newspapers that I cannot extend to others who are just as much entitled to it as they are. That is the reason why I shall vote against this resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that we can get no vote immediately upon this question. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Dixon] has been struggling for the floor for some time, and there is some other business that we ought to do. I move that the Senate adjourn until eleven o'clock to-morrow. Let us have an hour to do business. ["No!" No!"] We shall get no vote to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. That motion is not in order now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; my motion is that the Senate now adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I rise to a question of order. That motion is not in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is in order to adjourn to any hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is in order to adjourn to any hour.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly it is in order. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of meeting is only fixed by a motion, and of course it can be modified by a motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I move that the Senate adjourn until eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that in order?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Chair decides that it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted; and the Senate adjourned to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 3, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Speaker stated that if there were no objection the reading of the Journal of yesterday would be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. SINGREAVES, Mr. CHURCHILL, Mr. BURLEIGH, and Mr. MOORE for ten days; to Mr. McCULLOUGH for two weeks, and to Mr. KITCHEN for four days.

POST OFFICE, NEW YORK CITY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing the report of the supervising architect of the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the House, relative to the proposed post office at New York city; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPALDING. I think that communication ought to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as that committee has the subject under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the subject was before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and accordingly gave it that reference.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I hope that direction will not be given to the document. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has the subject under consideration and will report in four or five days, and it ought to have this report before it.

The SPEAKER. The reference will stand as it is, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, one of his Secretaries.

EXPENSES OF ELECTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from General Schofield relative to the expenses of holding elections in the first military district; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock has now arrived, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Door-keeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At five o'clock and ten minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of Edmund Willard, Abiathan Strickland, and Polly Peck, widow of Abjah Peck, soldiers of the war of 1812, all of Norwalk, Ohio, for pensions.

Also, the petition of James F. Smith, of Bellevue, Ohio, for relief for injuries received in the military service.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The petition of Captain Robert A. Dimmick and others, asking Congress to order a medal to be struck in bronze, to commemorate the preservation of the American Republic; and that one of such medals, under the direction of the War and Navy Departments, shall be presented to every officer, soldier, sailor, and marine who, by his service in the war and an honorable discharge, has earned such a tribute of his country's regard; and one, also, to the children of those who have fallen in their country's defense.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 4, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of the legislative proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the reading of the Journal of yesterday be dispensed with.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. GRIMES. No, no; let us hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to dispense with the reading of the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. GRIMES. I object. I want to know what is in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it must be read.

The Journal of yesterday's legislative proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOWARD. There are certain documents upon the executive files of the Senate which the managers of the impeachment desire to use as evidence. It is impossible to furnish them with certified copies without an order of the Senate, which I suppose should be taken in executive session. I therefore move that the Senate now go into executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me first to take up and get a vote upon the resolution in regard to the galleries, so that it may be settled for the next week.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. HOWARD. I insist on my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection if it is deemed necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion does not admit of argument.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of March last, information in relation to the buoys of New York harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Rehma Brown, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the repeal of the rule in relation to the issuing of tickets to the galleries during the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented three memorials of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying for the erection of a light-house on the point of the reef at Bailey's harbor; for an appropriation of $75,000 to improve the harbor of Superior and for the location of a light-house on Outer Island, in Lake Superior; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of John Harman, William Coolman, and Samuel Redfield, praying for the passage of the bill granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to present a resolution adopted at a regular meeting of the Machinists' and Blacksmiths' Union, No. 4, of Indiana, signed by the president, secretary, and corresponding secretary, expressing their desire that Congress should legislate so as that eight hours shall be a day's work in the Government employment. This resolution comes from an organization of highly respectable men in Indiana, and relates to a subject of general interest in that portion of the country. I ask its reference to the appropriate committee, and I make these remarks to call the attention of the committee to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee does the Senator move the reference of the resolution?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe similar memorials and resolutions have been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I move the reference of this resolution to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. WILLEY presented a petition of John Spangler, of Bolivar, West Virginia, praying to be allowed compensation for the use of his house, occupied by United States troops from September 1, 1862, to April 9, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. THAYER presented a petition of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars of Nebraska, remonstrating against the passage of the bill which provides that a stamp be affixed to each cigar, and praying for a tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to submit two amendments, which I shall offer for the consideration of the Senate, to Senate bill No. 164, to provide for appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, which I ask to have laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, no objection being made.

ADMISSION TO IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further morning business I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution introduced by me some days ago in relation to admission to the impeachment trial.

Mr. ANTHONY. When the Senate adjourned yesterday there was an order under consideration, which I think had better be disposed of first, about admitting the reporter of the Associated Press to a seat on the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would not come up until after the morning hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not in order now, regularly; neither is the proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Ordered, That after to-morrow the order of the 15th of March ultimo, relative to admission to the gallery, be suspended until further order, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate shall take special care that orders shall be observed in the galleries during the trial of the impeachment now pending; and he is hereby authorized to arrest and bring before the Senate any person who violates the orders of the Senate; and he shall take effective measures to secure admission to the diplomatic gallery, the ladies' gallery, and the reporters' gallery, to those only who are entitled to admission thereto under the rules.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to strike out—

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution is not yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking it up for consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope it will not be taken up; I want the other matter disposed of.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the yeas were twenty.

Mr. CONNESS and others called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can pass them both.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal to the Senator, whoever he may be, that asked the yeas and nays, to take them on the order itself and save one vote.

Mr. CONNESS. I made the call for the yeas and nays, and I did it because I am opposed to rescinding the rule. Therefore I desire to put the rescinding of the rule as far off as possible.

Mr. CONKLING. That is true; but I suggest to the Senator that if he would take it directly on the proposition it would save a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the order for consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to taking a vote on the proposition if it can be done without debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It cannot be done without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution of the Senator from Ohio for consideration.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conklings, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Williams—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Tipton, and Vickers—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morton, Ross, Sumner, Wilson, and Yates—12.

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the order.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to strike out where they occur the words "until to-morrow" and insert the words "for one week," and then strike out in another line where they occur the words "until further order;" so that if this experiment is to be carried out at all we shall have a week's experience of it, and then, without further order of the Senate, the issuing of tickets or the present regulation shall be resumed. There has been a great deal of expense incurred, and it had better be known—

Mr. SHERMAN. If that will make it more satisfactory to the Senate, as I wish to try the experiment to see whether the people will not behave as well as those who are invited here, I am willing to accept the modification and try the experiment.

Mr. CONNESS. That would be more acceptable to me; but I should not vote for it even with that modification. I totally deny that the people are not represented in the galleries.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the proposition?

Mr. CONNESS. I say that will make it more acceptable to me, but yet I should not vote for its adoption. I have no doubt whatever that the Senate might adopt it with that modification.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I withdraw my proposition to accept the modification.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from California would modify his amendment so as to say three days, I should be willing to agree to it. I hope that a week will close the trial.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I will accept the suggestion and modify my amendment so that it shall be for three days that the experiment shall be made.

I was about proceeding to say, Mr. President, when interrupted by the Senator from Ohio, that it had better be understood and known that, anticipating by the significant demonstration which occurred in the galleries of the Senate upon the decision of a question incidental in the first proceedings in the trial of the impeachment that there would be disorder, and that disorderly persons who had gathered from distant sections of the country to the capital for the purpose of creating disorder, and who did not in the public streets, or in the bar-rooms, or at many of the places of public resort pretend to conceal their demonstrations of disfavor to the Congress of the United States—in anticipation, I say, of these demonstrations and declarations, very considerable expense has been gone to preserve order. The regulation created for admission to the Senate galleries constituted a part of the regulations adopted; and in furtherance of those regulations a large police force has been employed, so that admission to the Senate wing of the building should not be obtained by persons other than orderly persons who desired to witness the trial pending these great proceedings. All that is to be brushed away—the expense gone to having been for the purpose of gratifying the morbid curiosity or perhaps the malignity of a portion of the population. I do not, of course, intimate in any respect that that is the purpose of the honorable Senators who advocate rescinding this rule; but that is the purpose and disposition and desire and wish of many persons outside of this Capitol; and I do not expect to see order preserved with this regulation rescinded. I do not expect to see delicate, backward, and well-ordered persons able to ascend the steps of the galleries, much less to enter the galleries. We shall have those come here as they go to places where very small amounts are charged for admission to shows, to observe, look on, and see the show—not persons deeply concerned in this great trial; not such persons as arrive here from the different towns and cities of the Union, who desire to see these great proceedings transpire; but persons who desire to gratify a morbid curiosity or some worse feeling.

It is very far, Mr. President, from my mind to draw distinctions between the people of this country other than those based, in these times of trouble and travail, upon the well-known inherent qualities of the population. If opportunities were given rebellion would be as rife in the streets of Washington to-morrow as it ever was. And you propose opening these galleries to the tread and occupancy of persons entertaining those feelings.

The regulations that have been adopted have worked well. Tickets have been issued every day, so that they have been changed generally, and, with some rare exceptions, there is a new audience in the galleries daily. I have given my tickets variously to persons from different States of the Union. My friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who had so many applications at the beginning of these proceedings, not being able to satisfy all his constituents, I have contributed to supply some of them, [laughter;] and I may as well say here that, on some occasions, I have referred others back to the Senator. I hope they found him and got tickets. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to the rescinding of this resolution; but, if the experiment is to be tried, let it be tried for a period of three days, and then, without further order, let the existing regulation be resumed. If it works well we shall all then be in favor of continuing the new rule. If it does not no further action will be necessary, and it will not depend upon our being able to obtain a legislative session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not know that I sympathize entirely with my friend from California as to the danger of great disorder here; for I believe we have the ability to keep order in this Capitol, and in this city, and in this nation. If we have not, we will try it if there is any doubt about it. But there is great injustice, in my opinion, in the proposition to rescind this resolution. I have a great respect for the people of Washington; but this Capitol does not belong to the people of Washington. It belongs to this nation, and when this great trial is transpiring it is our duty to make such arrangements that every part of this great nation may have here its witnesses; that they may come from Maine and from New Jersey and New York and every State. We have made arrangements by which they can be here, the nation can be here; and now we propose to adopt a rule which will exclude them; for who questions but that the first day these galleries are opened those who are willing to enter the rush or willing to stay here two or three hours will take possession of the galleries to the exclusion of those who come from various parts of the Union to be here as witnesses of this trial? And I further think it is a breach of good faith; for persons have come from various parts of the nation to stay here during this trial and witness it, knowing that they can be accommodated with seats. The arrangement that is made is perfectly just and equitable, equal for every part of the nation, as the seats in this building are at the disposal of the Senate and the Representatives of the people. If we rescind the rule, while I do not anticipate any disorder or violence, I do anticipate such a noise in this Capitol that we shall be unable to hear the proceedings. I trust that the Senate, inasmuch as they have adopted a rule which has worked well, will have stability enough to stand by the rule.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio seems to contemplate a distinction which it is quite difficult for me to understand, between those who are invited here and the people, from which I infer that this measure is a measure in behalf of what the honorable Senator supposes to be the people as contra-distinguished from those who are invited here. Now, I rather agree with the Senator from New Jersey that the regulations made on the part of the Senate have been such as would enable the Senate to make that just discrimination in behalf of that class of the people of this country who would have a right in the highest sense to visit this Senate while this great proceeding is under consideration; and if the honorable Senator from Ohio means that the populace (I use that phrase in no offensive sense) immediately surrounding this Capitol have the right to crowd these halls to the exclusion of those who may come here from abroad on invitation, if you please, then I object to it altogether, for I submit to the honorable Senator that in no sense whatever can the attendance upon this court, or this Senate while it sits to try impeachment, be considered in a popular sense; that is to say, it cannot from the nature of the case be popularized. The people in a body cannot be invited here, from the nature of the case.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to offer an amendment to the amendment, that both may receive his attention?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; with great pleasure. I should like to have as much of this subject as I can get to talk about. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, which was to add the following:

And when there may be white persons present at the door of the gallery who cannot obtain seats and colored persons may have seats in the gallery, it shall be the duty of the officers to unsat and remove from the gallery such seated colored persons and assign their seats to such white persons as may not have seats. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand that the Senator desires to argue that proposition?

Mr. DAVIS. No; I want you to argue it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will give the Senator five minutes of my time if he desires to argue it.

Mr. DAVIS. I am much obliged to you. It does not require any argument, unless it be from the honorable Senator from Maine.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Question!

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator from Illinois desire the question? [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought the Senator had given way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I was listening to see whether the honorable Senator from Illinois desired to address the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I supposed the Senator from Maine, after he had taken his seat, and an amendment had been offered by the Senator from Kentucky, had got through with his speech; but if he is determined to speak the hour out, I do not know any way to prevent him.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know any way on earth to prevent it. [Laughter.] I hope the honorable Senator from Illinois will see the condition in which he is placed, and possess his soul in as much patience as is practicable. [Laughter.] I am opposed to the passage of this order, and I suppose the honorable Senator from Illinois cannot have the slightest objection in the world to my presenting the reasons to the Senate for that opposition.

I was about proceeding to say that I think the Senate of the United States have made the most equitable and reasonable disposition of the whole subject that the case admitted of. If the desire is to popularize this affair, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] made a proposition yesterday which comes the nearest to it of anything that has occurred to me; and I was greatly surprised that the friends of that measure, those who exhibited so much solicitude yesterday to pass that measure, should have consented to thrust this in ahead of it this morning.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I want to know whether this is the part of the Senator's speech in which he was "about proceeding to say," or whether it is the speech itself? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not quite understand the Senator's remark. What I was about to say, Mr. President, when interrupted, [laughter,] was, that the measure best calculated to popularize this trial was the one introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island yesterday.

Mr. CONKLING. With the Senator's permission, I beg to inquire of him whether the purpose of this eloquent speech which he is now endeavoring to make is to defeat the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, or to defeat the proposition which he now refers to, and which is behind this—the one offered by the Senator from Rhode Island—inasmuch as but five minutes remain. My curiosity on that point is very active.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, I will satisfy the honorable Senator's curiosity with the greatest pleasure. My desire is to defeat this particular proposition, and give the precedence to the proposition lying so near the heart of the honorable Senator from New York; and if he will move to proceed to the consideration of that subject at this time I will give way with great pleasure for that purpose; or, if the honorable Senator will second it, I will move that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator say that no one else will oppose that resolution in the same way that he is opposing this? If so, I will give way at once.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the honorable Senator asks me whether I suppose any other Senator will argue that proposition as I think I am very properly arguing this I beg to say that I cannot answer that. I have no objection, however, to satisfy the curiosity of my honorable friend from New York, to satisfy him that I am entirely sincere in the proposition he seemed to have such an earnest desire for yesterday, and to my astonishment to-day yields to have displaced by a proposition which he might know, I think, would not pass in a half hour or fifteen minutes time of the Senate—a proposition which proposes to rescind the established rule of the Senate which has provided for order in this body during the trial of the impeachment, against which I have not heard the slightest complaint.

Mr. SHERMAN. As there is but one minute left I will ask the Senator from Maine if there ever was a court of justice in the world organized under English law which excluded everybody from getting into the gallery or gave preference in allowing people to witness the exhibition? I ask him whether, in this country, there has been any such case?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio a question, whether there is a country in the world that furnishes one twentieth part of the room for the public that we furnish for this court.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say this, that, in my judgment, this is an exceptional case. It was never done before. We deny people who come a thousand miles to witness this trial an opportunity to see this spectacle, and give our tickets out in such a way that the mass of the people who come here have no opportunity to witness the proceedings.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg to correct the Senator, if the Senator from Maine will allow me. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I know that; I ask his permission.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. In the Surratt trial—I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio—such a regulation had to be adopted. I state that to the Senate, not being able to secure the attention of the Senator from Ohio. And it is always so on inauguration days here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would state a fact—

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, all legislative business must be suspended.

The President pro tempore thereupon vacated the chair, and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m., when, on motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 4, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in further answer to their resolution of the 9th ultimo, the accompanying report from the Secretary of State.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, April 2, 1868.

The SPEAKER. The report relates to the treaty made with the German States relating to the rights of naturalized citizens.

The message and the accompanying report were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF GEORGIA CONVENTION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the resolutions of the constitutional convention of Georgia in regard to the removal of political disabilities; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House resolutions adopted by the New England annual conference on the state of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHTING THE HALL.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report, accompanied by a resolution, from the Committee on Accounts, relative to the means of lighting the Hall of the House. I do not desire to make the report for the purpose of action at this time; but as it is an important matter I desire that the report may be printed and recommitted and put in such a position by a motion to reconsider being entered that it can be called up when there is no pressing business before the House, and passed or rejected as the House may see fit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to know what the report is?

Mr. BROOMALL. The resolution recommends the adoption of the electric mode of lighting which is used on the Dome instead of the mode now in use.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the reception of the report.

The report was received, recommitted to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted.

The motion was entered and passed over for the present.

EMMOR WARE.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1000) for the relief of Emmor Ware, of the State of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to have an understanding that when bills and other matters are introduced and referred by unanimous consent pending the impeachment trial they shall not be brought back by motions to reconsider, and I suggest that that understanding shall relate to everything introduced to-day except the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be ordered that during the pendency of the impeachment trial all bills, &c., which may be introduced and referred shall be considered as reconsidered and laid on the table, with the exception of the resolution reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL].

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. PILE for ten days, and to Messrs. KNOTT and BURR indefinitely.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Erastus Spalding, copies being left.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until Thursday next at twelve o'clock m.

The SPEAKER. The report will be entered on the Journal.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to make a suggestion to the House. In view of the fact of the adjournment of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, until Thursday next, and of the further fact of the absence of a great number of gentlemen, who have left the city with the understanding that no business would be done, my suggestion is that it shall be the general understanding that no business shall be transacted in the House until Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. That would be business of a most important character, because it would bind all those who are absent now with the understanding that no business should be transacted to-day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We may as well adjourn over, as, owing to the understanding that no business would be done, there is hardly a quorum of members in the city.

The SPEAKER. It will require a quorum to adjourn for more than one day, if the point is made.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make a statement if there is no objection.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have made the motion to adjourn over with no disposition to interfere with any business, but for the reason that I thought there would then be one day's session of the House previous to the meeting of the Senate for the trial, and if the managers should have anything to submit to the House they would be able to submit it on that day, so that they would be prepared to meet the court at its next sitting. I know that many gentlemen on both sides of the House have left the city with the understanding that no business of a legislative nature was to be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to inquire of the Speaker whether, in his judgment, there is a quorum in the city or would be by Monday, so that the House could proceed to transact business on that day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that there is no quorum at the present time in the city in consequence of the understanding that there should be no business of a legislative character transacted unless the House should be notified of it previous to going over to the Senate. But as to whether there would be a quorum here on Monday, if it should be understood that the House would resume business on that day, the Chair cannot tell. A great number of members have gone home.

Mr. BLAINE. I call for a division on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I give notice now that you shall not transact business without a quorum.

The House divided on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion; and there were 35 in the affirmative and 1 in the negative—no quorum voting.

Mr. PIKE. I think it would be very well for the House to come here on Monday and see how many members there are present; and then, if there be not a quorum present, we can adjourn until Thursday.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the enforcement of the rule. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. COVODE. Would it not be in order and proper to have a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The Chair does not believe that under the order of the House a motion for a call of the House would be in order, because the understanding was that, without previous notice by the Speaker, no business should be done after the return of the House every day to its Chamber, and if a call were made it should be a call of members for legislative business, and the Chair thinks that would not be in good faith.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg to make one remark.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make a suggestion, if gentlemen will allow me. It is quite evident to every gentleman—I do not speak of it at all because I have any interest, for I expect to leave the city—that there are a good many members in the city who desire to make speeches.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. There is no proposition before the House. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from Maine was about to submit a proposition.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] to withdraw his point of order. I presume we can come to some understanding that will be satisfactory all around. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. SCOFIELD. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. PIKE. Let us come here on Monday and see if we can transact business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I withdraw my point of order in favor of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman is very civil. He took me off the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Well, I withdraw it in favor of everybody.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Maine in a moment. I desire to say that if there was likely to be a quorum here on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, it is very important that we should make some progress in the call of committees. The Committee on Military Affairs, which has some important measures to present, has not been called for more than two months; and, if I supposed we could get a quorum here on these days, I should be very glad to have the House in session for business. That was the reason why I asked the Speaker what the probability was of having a quorum on Monday; but, as the Speaker says it is manifest there is not a quorum in the city, I am quite willing to give way and hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. The suggestion which I desired to make was, that for the three days intervening between now and Thursday nothing shall be in order except debate in the House, if such an understanding be in order under the ruling of the Chair. We might use these three days as Saturdays have been used. As soon as the impeachment trial ends the business of the House will be resumed with such vigor and the committees will be so pressing with their measures that the season for debate on the part of members will be narrowed down to the closest possible limits. It seems to me a fair thing that, by unanimous consent, these three days be allowed to any gentleman who might desire to come here for the purpose of making speeches.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I cannot see why the gentleman should object to adjourning over or make this suggestion when he has stated to the House that he intends to leave the city.

Mr. BLAINE. I said that to show that I was not selfish in making the suggestion and had no purpose to take advantage of it to make a speech myself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have not seen one man yet who wants to make a speech.

Mr. BLAINE. Having been allowed to make this explanation, I will withdraw the call for a division on the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire why debate cannot go on in the House during the progress of the impeachment, the same as we have it on Saturdays?

The SPEAKER. Because the House has ordered otherwise by resolving that the House will accompany the managers to the bar of the Senate. That resolution would have to be rescinded when there is a quorum present. The Chair will state, in answer to the gentleman from Maine, that the Chair is at the present time informed of but three gentlemen who desire to speak in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAINE. I have stated that having been allowed to make the explanation I withdraw the call for a division.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to inquire if there is any constitutional objection to any member going to his room and making his speech there if he wants to?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then that will answer just as well as if we came here.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will now renew his motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I renew the motion, that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned until Wednesday next.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 469) confirming the title to a tract of land in Burlington, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 470) to remove the political disabilities resting upon certain citizens of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 471) to indemnify Abial Morrison for property destroyed by hostile Indians in Washington Territory in the years 1855 and 1856; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the papers of this claimant be withdrawn from the files and also referred with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No adverse report. The bill passed the House at the last session, and was lost in the Senate for want of time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 472) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security;" which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the bill be printed and go upon the Calendar. It comes from the Judiciary Committee, but has never been formally referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, no objection being made.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 132) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As the resolution is short, I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to issue such commissary and quartermaster stores to the expedition engaged in the exploration of the river Colorado under direction of Professor Powell as may be necessary to enable the expedition to prosecute its work.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to ask the consideration of the Senate to that resolution at this time, if there is no objection. I will explain it in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done under the rules by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. CONNESS. What is it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state in one moment, and then, if there is any objection, let it go to a committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am inclined to object, as I desire to call up a resolution and have it disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me state what it is. It will not occupy more than two or three minutes. I will state that Professor Powell is engaged in the exploration of the Colorado river of the West. He was there last year.

Mr. GRIMES. Under whose authority?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The authority of the State of Illinois.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the matter ought to go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator has not heard my statement. If, after hearing it, he has any objection I will allow the resolution to be referred.

The State of Illinois made an appropriation for this purpose, and Professor Powell, under the auspices of the State—he is connected with the Normal University of that State—was engaged last year in this service. The Government last year furnished him with a guard for protection, and, I think, furnished him supplies from the commissary department, which he paid the Government price for. He is going out again this year. The Government of the United States are very much interested in this exploration. The Secretary of War has been consulted in regard to it, and the resolution meets his approbation; but, as the law now is, he would not feel at liberty to furnish these supplies. That is all there is of it.

Mr. CONNESS. Are they to be furnished gratis?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, they will be if the resolution is passed.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is to ascertain whether there is any objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, if anybody objects.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not object. I want to know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the resolution will be considered at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is an objection, I understand, and the Senator from Illinois moves to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

SETTLEMENT OF WAR DEPARTMENT ACCOUNTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate what was the course of practice in respect to the settlement of public accounts and the drawing of requisitions therefor by the Secretary of War upon the Treasury prior to the passage of the late act respecting the prompt settlement of public accounts, and what, if any, evils exist under the present law in that respect.

DAMAGES TO STEAMER MONITOR IN JAPAN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 307.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe I had the floor, and yielded it to the Senator from Vermont to offer a resolution. I want to take up the little resolution that I mentioned to the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senate to take up a little matter, the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations that was considered the other day, to which attention was called by the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.] It is Senate joint resolution No. 123.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) authorizing the Secretary of State to adjust certain claims, and directing the payment thereof.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Indiana has an amendment that he proposes to offer, I understand. I call his attention to the fact that the resolution is now before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from California was specially interested in this subject. I expected to have had an amendment prepared from the Committee on Naval Affairs, but the committee have not been able finally to agree upon it. Therefore, I am not prepared to offer it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator had better offer it in a separate bill. I do not think this resolution ought to be delayed any longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Authorizing the Secretary of State to adjust certain claims. If the Secretary will read it through it will be understood in a moment. I explained it the other day.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, directed to ascertain and allow the damages which ought to be paid to the owners of the steamer Monitor or Fee Pang, their representatives or assigns, for the injuries sustained from being fired into by the batteries of the Daimio of Nagato, in July, 1864, and that the sum allowed by the Secretary of State, together with the expenses attending the ascertainment thereof, be paid out of the moneys received for indemnities from the Government of Japan.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a commissioner or commissioners, as may be necessary, to take testimony in Japan or elsewhere, in relation to such damages, and report the same to him; and that any consular or diplomatic officer who may be so appointed shall be entitled to a reasonable compensation, to be allowed by the Secretary of State, in addition to his official salary or emoluments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That appropriation of money is proposed to be made out of a special fund which came into the Treasury under the convention of 1864, according to which the Government of Japan paid to the United States, for injuries to our commerce, the sum of $750,000. This is one of the vessels that, as I understand, were insulted and perhaps injured by the rebel prince under the authority of Japan. All the money is not to go to this vessel. I am not sure that any one ought to be provided for until all are provided for. That is the only question in my mind. There was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs the claim of Commander McDougall and his men for their gallant conduct on one of the vessels of war of our Government in resenting one of these insults; and the character of our country was very handsomely maintained by the captain and his men. I am of the opinion that a portion of this money ought to go in the nature of prize money to the captain and crew of that vessel; perhaps from thirty to fifty thousand dollars of it. Then the vessel that was fired into two days before the captain made his attack, perhaps, ought to be provided for also. I have not examined the subject enough to know what other vessels were injured by this rebel prince of the Japanese Government besides the vessel that is to be provided for by the resolution now before the Senate.

I make these suggestions that the Senator from Maine may decide whether it is entirely safe and proper to provide for one vessel until all are provided for. It is very clear that the money does not all go for the injuries to this particular vessel, and that there are others who have proper claims upon this fund.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to inquire whether this subject has ever been reported upon by any of the standing committees of the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say that the Committee on Naval Affairs has charge of the claim so far as Captain McDougall and the men under his command are concerned, their claim being in the nature of prize money for the destruction of three vessels of this rebel prince. One was sunk, another blown up, and the third, perhaps, almost destroyed. They claim that they are entitled to prize money, not according to the letter of our laws, but according to their spirit.

Mr. HOWARD. Was the subject-matter of the present resolution, now before the Senate, ever acted upon by a committee?

Mr. HENDRICKS. In answer to the Senator from Michigan, I will say that this particular resolution was not before the Committee on Naval Affairs, nor has the naval committee decided upon the claim that I speak of, although my own mind—

Mr. FESSENDEN. This resolution was reported by me from the Committee on Foreign Relations with a written report from the Secretary of State.

Mr. HOWARD. I was not aware that it had been under the consideration of any one of the committees.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I explained this matter the other day. There is a sum of money, amounting to about eight hundred thousand dollars, coming to us from Japan. There are no claims upon it which can cover, by any possibility, over $100,000. I stated the other day, and I think stated correctly, although my honorable friend from California [Mr. CONNESS] thought I was in error, that the immediate cause of the attack which was made was the previous attack made upon this very vessel, the Monitor, which was fired into and injured. In consequence of that the attack was made by our vessels afterward. Now, the owners of this vessel, which was injured, have made an application that out of that fund of about eight hundred thousand dollars they may be compensated to the extent of the injuries received by her.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Maine what was the date of the attack on this vessel?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I am unable to state.

Mr. CONNESS. The joint resolution states that the attack was made on the Monitor, or Fee Pang, in 1864; so that the Senator must be in error in regard to the fact he has just now stated. The other attack was made in 1863.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The first outrage on our commerce was about the 1st of July, 1863.

Mr. CONNESS. And the firing was on the steamer Pembroke.

Mr. GRIMES. There were two vessels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I may be in error about that; but these parties have presented papers and filed their claim at the State Department. No other claim has been made upon this fund by any vessel that was injured. The owners of this vessel desire to have testimony taken, and to have their own claim settled. The amount paid to our Government by Japan is probably enough to pay four or five times over all possible claims that may be made. I explained the matter the other day as the facts came from the Secretary of State, the proper authority. There were certain injuries, occasioned by one of these Daimios, to our commerce. The representatives of foreign Powers made their claim upon the Japanese Government for these injuries, and they claimed a very large sum of money; but as an alternative of the claim they said they would take another port to be opened, which they thought would be done rather than have that large sum of money paid; but the Japanese Government chose to pay the money, and paid $3,000,000, of which our Government, I understand, gets about eight hundred thousand dollars. Now, the injuries to all our commerce that took place there, perhaps, will not reach $75,000.

Mr. SUMNER. No; not that much.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This claim is about thirty thousand dollars. I think that is more than the parties are entitled to; I do not suppose they are entitled to more than $20,000. Probably the claim of the Pembroke is not much larger.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think the Pembroke was struck at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And the Pembroke has made no claim whatever; and that is the only other vessel, I understand, in regard to which there is a possibility of a claim.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Maine in what way is the amount to be ascertained? By the Secretary of State, if I understand it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of State is to have evidence taken by our consul or to appoint somebody to take evidence on the subject.

Mr. HOWARD. But who is to decide finally as to the amount?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of State, whoever he may be, with all the papers before him.

Mr. HOWARD. Will that be entirely fair to the opposite party?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who is the opposite party?

Mr. HOWARD. The Japanese Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Japanese Government have nothing to do with it. They have paid the money, $800,000, and that money is in the Treasury, and this claim is in the hands of the Secretary of State, I suppose. There is no other party except the Government of the United States. The Secretary of State recommends this, and the resolution was drawn at the office of the Secretary of State. There will be plenty of money with which to pay the Pembroke or any other vessel that may hereafter appear. The only question is whether this shall be delayed for other claims to be made which have never yet been presented.

Mr. HOWARD. How much has been allowed at the State Department?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nothing has been allowed yet. It is for the State Department to examine and find out. The claim itself, as I am informed by the owner, probably will not exceed—he does not expect to recover over thirty thousand dollars, if he does that; but the exact amount of the injury to the vessel has not yet been ascertained. It is a small question.

Mr. CONNESS. I of course have no disposition to delay the payment of this claim. The statement made by the honorable Senator in the main is correct. The money has been paid into the Treasury of the United States by the Japanese Government, and is there subject to such claims for injuries as our citizens have sustained. It appears that the owners of the Monitor or Fee Pang have presented their claim for injuries sustained by their vessel, but that the owners of other American vessels sustaining injuries have not as yet presented their claims.

A part of the statement made by the honorable Senator when first up, namely, that the treaty and payment of the money, as well as the attack by our national vessel on the forts and ships of this prince, were the consequence of the attack upon the Monitor, was not strictly correct. The proceedings were founded distinctly upon the attack made on the Pembroke in the year previous; and those attacks were continued, not only upon our commerce but upon that of the other treaty Powers, until the Japanese were pretty soundly drubbed, and the payment of this money was the consequence. I think, however, the Senator ought to amend this resolution slightly in such a manner as to cover other claims without delaying the prosecution and payment of this claim at all, so as to dispose of the whole matter at once. I suggest that if after the word "Fee Pang" the words "or other American vessels" were inserted, and then before "1864" insert "1863 and," the facts could be taken together, and it would not delay the payment of this claim at all. If no other claims were presented in the meantime, of course nothing would come of it, and by no possible circumstance could the payment of this claim be delayed. Therefore, I move to insert in the fifth line, after the word "Fee Pang," the words "or other American vessel or vessels," and at the beginning of the eighth line the words "1863 and." Then the facts can all be taken together.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator understand that any other vessel was injured? Was the Pembroke struck at all?

Mr. CONNESS. I really do not know. The papers are all in the possession of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire of the Committee on Naval Affairs if any claim has been before them for the Pembroke?

Mr. HENDRICKS. As I said before, the claim that is before the Naval Committee is for prize money on behalf of the commander and men.

Mr. CONNESS. What possible objection can there be to the amendment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nothing, except my fear that it may delay the settlement of this case.

Mr. CONNESS. It cannot in any respect whatever.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Another objection to it is that it is fishing for applications.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the Senator from Maine that the evidence does not show whether the Pembroke has been injured or not. She escaped. In my judgment the claim for prize money will probably not exceed $30,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, then; this fund of $800,000 will cover, four times over, all possible claims against it. I do not think it very wise, when a claim has been filed, to invite other claims on funds in the Treasury by inserting such language as is now proposed when no such claim has been made from 1863, and it is now 1868. It is merely putting out an invitation to all persons, notifying them that here is a fund, and that they may make claims upon it. I do not think it is wise legislation, unless a claim has been made or there is some proof that some other vessel was injured.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Maine that he limit the amount which may be paid by the Secretary of State to the amount claimed by this vessel, not exceeding $30,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the first claim was $40,000. I have no objection to limiting it to that; but I do not think it is at all necessary. This resolution was drawn at the Department of State.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If that claim is filed with the Secretary of State, I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This resolution was drawn there to cover the matter. I do not think it wise to put in others.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with the Senator from Maine that it does not seem expedient now, in passing this resolution, to put in words that will be like fishing words to fish for a claim. In point of fact, this money has been in the hands of our Government for a long time, and there is only one claim that has been filed. On that claim there has been a report made to the Department of State by the examiner of claims. That report was before the committee when they acted on this resolution; and that report shows that there is a certain degree of merit in the claim.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I will withdraw the amendment to save time.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON A BELL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 881, which will excite no debate whatever, I think.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to take this opportunity to remind the Senate that the Naval appropriation bill, which was nearly finished the other day, ought to be considered and disposed of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not in the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill will not take any time, I imagine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell for the use of Saint Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana.

The bill will be a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Rev. Edward Sorin the amount of duties paid by him under protest to the collector of the port of New York in 1867 on a bell donated and imported from France for the use of Saint Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, institutions incorporated by the State of Indiana for philosophical and literary purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I want to remind the Senator from Ohio that some years ago a like application was made on behalf of a church to have refunded the duties paid on a bell which was presented to the church by some parties, and it was refused.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will hear the brief report read, he will get the facts in such a way that I think he will not object to the bill. I doubt very much whether the duties were properly collected in this case. But the report will explain it if the Senator desires information as to the facts. The case to which he refers was probably a case that accrued before the act of 1861, which I think really exempted these articles. I do not think this bell was subject to duty, and, therefore, the duty was improperly levied.

Mr. HOWE. When was the bell imported?

Mr. SHERMAN. Last summer; but under the law as it now stands there is a provision exempting bronze castings and works of art, &c., for colleges and public libraries. The only question was whether a bell came under exception of the present tariff act. My own impression is that it does.

Mr. HOWE. Is there a written report?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a printed report, a very brief one.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. SHERMAN from the Committee on Finance on the 28th of March:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred H. R. No. 881, refunding duties paid under protest on importation from France of a bell donated for the use of St. Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana, beg leave to report:

The bell referred to weighs sixteen thousand six hundred and fifty pounds, and is the largest in the United States. It is composed of ninety-four per cent. of Lake Superior copper. This was exported to France, and there, with six per cent. of tin, cast into this bell. It was presented as a charity by the Sisters of Mercy in France to the above-named institution of learning, conducted by the Sisters of Mercy in Indiana.

It was imported under the supposition that it would be admitted free of duty under a clause of section twenty-three of the tariff act approved March 2, 1861, which exempts from duty "all philosophical apparatus, instruments, books, maps, and charts, statues, statuary, busts and casts of marble, bronze, alabaster, or plaster of Paris, paintings and drawings, etchings, specimens of sculpture, cabinets of coins, medals, regalia, gems, and all collections of antiquities." Provided, The same be specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Under this clause organs have been admitted free of duty. The bell is certainly a cast of bronze for a college, and is certainly as much a work of art as an organ. The collector of customs did not so regard it, and the duties, amounting to $2,203 83, were paid. The college now asks the refunding of these duties for the following reasons:

1. The bell was a donation to our institutions of learning, which institutions during the late war sent even its best and most efficient teachers, to the number of fifty, to serve in the military hospitals. Some died, and many returned home shattered in health, but from our institution we kept the number recruited until the close of the war. For these services we were encouraged by some of our most eminent generals to believe that the duty (so insignificant in its amount to Congress, yet onerous to Sisters of Mercy, whose lives are devoted to works of charity) would be remitted. Therefore when the bell reached New York we paid the amount under protest.

2. The second reason why the memorialists supposed that the bell would be passed free of duty was based on the fact that, as a work of art, or rather mechanism, it is the finest article of the bell kind in the United States, and as it was not imported for sale, but merely for the adornment and improvement of public literary institutions, the memorialists pray Congress to encourage the importation of such rare and valuable donations, that are in a manner public property, by allowing on said bell the remission of duty paid last August.

3. The memorialists consider that another strong reason for remitting the duty is found in the fact that the copper, which forms ninety-four per cent. of the composition, is native ore, having been exported to France from Lake Superior.

Upon the facts and reasons thus stated your committee recommend that the duty be refunded.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, I do not know but that if this was an original question I should vote to remit these duties; but I do respectfully insist that the rule ought to be uniform, and I cannot perceive a single fact which distinguishes this case from the case to which I referred, where such a remission of duties was absolutely refused.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not remember the case mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin, but I know, since I have been connected with the Committee of Ways and Means and the Finance Committee, we have made remissions in cases like this, in cases much weaker than this, many times. There are at least fifty precedents of remissions of duties to public colleges, and therefore, in consequence of the general practice that has grown up to remit duties on works of art, this provision in the tariff act was inserted. I presume that the bell referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin must have been imported before the passage of that act.

Mr. HOWE. What act?

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff act of 1861-62.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not mean to express any opinion on the measure, but one case that has occurred within two or three years was in Charleston, South Carolina, and I think I presented the petition myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know there was a case of remission of duties on an organ in Boston.

Mr. SUMNER. I remember that case; but here were bells sent out from England to a church that had been very much injured, nearly destroyed, during the rebellion, and it was very important, and they so regarded, to have those bells; and the parties could not well afford to pay the duties. They sent a petition to Congress, which I think I presented, asking to have the duties remitted; but the Senate refused to do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will notice another matter that makes the case a very equitable one, besides considerations of charity. This bell is made almost entirely of American materials. If all the bell had been made of American materials it would have been admitted free of duty on the general rule that articles of home production are admitted back free of duty. There is no foundry in this country that could cast a bell of this size.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator say that raw material sent abroad and manufactured comes back free of duty in the shape of a manufacture?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the general provision of law when articles are sent abroad and there all made of domestic material; they are admitted back free of duty. That is the general provision of the tariff law now.

Mr. HOWE. So wheat sent to Canada and made into flour would be admitted back free of duty?

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] can tell better about that; but it is a general principle of the tariff law that articles made entirely of American products, sent abroad and being manufactured, are admitted free of duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I confess I cannot recollect any such provision of law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know of any instance except the manufacture of railroad iron, which has sometimes been allowed to be transferred across the line.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have seen such a provision of law, and that was one of the points made by these ladies. The case on the equitable view presented by them is, I think, very strong. It comes undoubtedly within many precedents. I do not know anything about the circumstances of the case mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin; but here the article is made of American production sent abroad to be cast, where, from the nature of the article, it could not be cast here, the bell-founders in this country not being able to cast so large a bell. It is entirely a work of charity for public use, for the benefit of a large college and seminary of learning conducted by these ladies, who, as they say, have been exceedingly patriotic during the war, and sent from among their number some fifty nurses in our hospitals. They certainly do make a case of equity which I think the Senate ought at once to yield to.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, considering this as a charity, I should not insist very strongly on a duty being assessed upon the article if the rule was uniform. There are, I know, instances of such remissions; and I found the cases and exhibited them to the committee when this other application was pending; but, while it was conceded that in the happier days of the Republic such importations had been permitted free of duty, it was then said, and, my impression is, almost unanimously, by the committee, if not entirely so, that the necessities of the Republic would not warrant it, and a new rule must be enforced; and such was the rule in that case. There is, I repeat again, no single fact which distinguishes between this case and that. That was a charity, as this is. That was a charity to a church, which, I suppose, is as creditable an institution in every way and as much entitled to the fostering care of the Government as the institution which petitions in this case. That is the only distinction between the two. I do not know that that was manufactured of American material, which this is said to be, in part; but I think the honorable Senator from Ohio must be mistaken in supposing that our tariff laws exempt from duty manufactured articles imported simply because they are manufactured from American material.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have sent for the tariff act.

Mr. HOWE. If that is the fact, it is a feature in the tariff laws which I think has not attracted general attention, and which I think will cease to exist when it becomes generally known.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that the tariff act provides that articles manufactured abroad out of American material shall be exempt from duty. I assume, therefore, that there is no such provision. If there be one, there can be no question as to the propriety of passing this bill. But supposing that there is none, it seems to me to be very clear that we should pass the bill. There are no persons in the country belonging to a religious sect, or belonging to any other class of our population, who have conferred more especial benefit upon our soldiers than the Sisters of Mercy. They have been found in every hospital; they have been found, I believe, upon every field of battle, attending to the wounded, consoling the dying, at the hazard of their own lives, and the hazard in very many cases proved to be fatal. And now, in consideration of their services, in honor of their Christian benevolence, they have had presented to them this bell for a college to which they are attached; and all that they ask is that we should permit them to hold it clear of the obligation to pay the duty. It is doubtful, in my opinion, whether it should not have been exempt from duty under that portion of the tariff act read by the honorable member from Ohio. It is a bronze manufacture, as much a bronze manufacture as any other of the manufactures of that description. Ninety-four per cent. of it consists of American copper. They have been obliged to work the rest of it, the other portion of the percentage of the whole into it of tin, for the purpose of enabling them to make such a bell as this is. It is in point of fact an ornament; not an ornament of the parlor, not an ornament of the chamber of private citizens, but an ornament to the college, a valuable ornament to the college, and a possession of which the college is naturally proud; a possession, as I think, of which we should be proud, because it is a tribute to that benevolence, that Christian benevolence, which has lent such a charm to the character of the people to whom the soldier and ourselves are so much indebted. I should hope, therefore, whether it falls within the tariff act of 1861, to which the honorable member from Ohio referred, or whether it falls within the act of which he has read us a section, the Senate will agree to pass the bill refunding to them the amount of the duties which they have been compelled to pay.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I favored the report of this bill, and favored it because, as I thought, it was in the spirit, although not in the letter, of our law. We have heretofore been in the habit of allowing books, philosophical apparatus and instruments, busts, and casts of marble and bronze, and alabaster, &c., to be imported for institutions of learning free of duty. I do not think this is included in this provision, or that it could under any possibility be admitted under the laws exempt from duty. I know of no act that allows the transportation from the United States into other countries of goods, and then to be reimported back again, exempt of duty, except in the single case of rerolled railroad iron, and that is provided for by a special statute; and perhaps I might include barrels or carboys that are sent abroad to hold petroleum, or something of that sort, as suggested to me by my colleague.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are not manufactured abroad, but only returned here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But it seems to me, Mr. President, that under the circumstances we ought to allow the bell to come in free. It was a special gift of the Sisters of Mercy in France; and it seems to me that under the circumstances, having been made out of American material in chief part, it would be rather illiberal on the part of Congress to refuse to grant their request and allow it to come in free of duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator proceeds I will refer now to the principle. I find that in substance I was correct, although I do not think the language of the law would bring this case within it; nor am I at present able to lay my hand upon the clause of the statute, but I find in the collated digest of the tariff that all manufactures of the United States exported and brought back are admitted free of duty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is a different thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a case where nearly all the cost, the chief cost of the article, is the value of copper which enters into the bell. It is sent abroad for casting simply because the casting could not be made in this country. I think myself that it does not come within the rule, because it is changed by being cast, by being mixed with the small portion of tin cast into the bell.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator would not admit that American cotton or American wool sent abroad and manufactured into cloths should be imported free of duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where the manufacturer greatly changes the article it would not be admitted free. I do not think the mere casting of the copper, without any great admixture of other materials, in the form of a bell, is such a great change that the case does not come at least within the spirit of the rule which allows American manufactures when imported to be admitted duty free. That is the law, though it does not quite reach this case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, all I wish to say upon this subject is that I fear the introduction of the principle of taking off duties of any kind, either internal or external, for the reason that it is for the benefit of a charitable institution, or something of that description. I know that up to this session of Congress, in bills of both characters, Congress have steadily refused to do anything of the kind, because they saw that it would be but the entering wedge to a very large number of claims of the same description. For instance, we lay a tax on incomes in the internal revenue law. We had several applications made to us not to exact that tax off the income of charitable institutions; and, as you may observe, the reasoning is very strong in such cases in favor of an exemption; but, whatever character they might have, Congress has, up to this time, resisted the introduction of the principle either into the tariff laws or the internal revenue laws. And, as the honorable Senator from Wisconsin observed, in another case applicable to a bell for a church we adhered to the rule. Now, if it be true, as I suppose it is, that this bell is made out of American material in a very great degree, I think that does not strengthen the argument, for it is only sending abroad the material to manufacture articles and then exempting them from duty on account of the original material. That is directly in the face of our doctrine of protecting our own manufactures. They cast bells in this country, and our bell-founders are as much entitled to protection as any other class of manufacturers.

The argument has been used by the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] that this bill should be passed because it is in favor of Sisters of Charity. Well, sir, I appreciate their services as much as anybody; but they have no claims that I know of over the vast numbers of American women who went into the camps and performed precisely the same services without pay, and services quite as valuable in every particular. The country undoubtedly owes a debt of gratitude to all of them, and to everybody else who served the country in its time of trial; but I do not regard it as being a sufficient excuse for making an exception in this case simply on that account.

Of course it is an unpleasant duty to make even the show of opposition to anything of this description, and my own objection is simply that it is introducing into our system a new principle, which, if carried into the revenue laws of both characters, would deprive us of a very large income which we cannot afford to spare, after the encroachments which have been made so far.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to inquire of the Chair if the unfinished business is not in order at one o'clock?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to be voted on.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am perfectly willing; but I want it understood that the unfinished business is laid aside informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have nothing to say in regard to the order of business, but I do not wish to call up this bill again. I hope it will be now disposed of.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish the unfinished business to lose its place, and I simply enter my protest for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the unfinished business is the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will allow it to lie over informally, whatever it is, for the purpose of disposing of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the unfinished business is the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution to permit the reporter of the Associated Press to occupy a seat on the floor during the trial of the impeachment. That is before the Senate, and can only be passed over by unanimous consent. Is there any objection to continuing the consideration of the present bill? No objection being made, House bill No. 881 continues before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I could show many precedents of this kind where importations for charitable purposes and for colleges have been admitted free of duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those exceptions were in old times, when we could afford it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had a list of some forty or fifty cases furnished me by persons who are desirous to get this bill passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They were before the war, were they not?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; not all of them. One occurred in New York, two years ago, of a remission of duty for some charitable purpose. I think it was a remission for a church. There were cases nearly every year for three years, and finally the principle was adopted which is incorporated in the proviso in the law, quoted in the report, declaring that all works of art, all bronzes or casts, statuary, marble, &c., for colleges or philosophical and literary institutions, should be admitted free of duty. It seems to me that this case comes clearly within that rule. I do not see why a great bell is not as much a work of art as an organ. One is to give sound to call the people in, and the other is to make music for those who assemble in church. They are both of the same character; both produce sounds, and musical sounds. One is a chime of bells which call the people to the sanctuary; the other is to amuse them when they get there, or to turn their thoughts heavenward. I trust that this request of the Ladies of Mercy, who appeal to our benevolence, will be granted without a division. I did not myself suppose when this bill was presented that it would create the least division or debate. I trust we may have a vote and remit these duties.

Mr. CONNESS. I will only occupy a minute, sir. I hope that this bill will pass, not upon the general principle as stated, which I do not admit, because it would be a discrimination against labor, that because it is a domestic product that enters into a manufacture, the domestic product may be sent into a foreign country and then imported here free of duty. I do not think that our revenue laws contain any such general provision, and if they did it would be well to change it at once. But upon its merits I desire the bill to pass. It is a very small matter to the Government of the United States. It is in behalf of persons whose lives are given for benevolent, philanthropic, and religious purposes; and I am willing to give a vote without any regard to the association, its religious class or otherwise, in every such case, for a remission of the duty. It can scarcely be called a subscription for this great purpose, and if it were it would be rather creditable to us than the contrary. But there are reasons, and they have been stated, clearly showing this to be a case in which the duty, in all probability, was wrongfully collected and exacted, and I think it ought to be remitted and paid back, and I hope it will be.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hardly expected the Senator from Maine to oppose this bill. It is only about eight or ten days ago since he asked that all articles brought into this country which might be used in the ship-building business should come in free, and I voted with him because I thought he was right. He said to us that the ship-building interest was very much depressed, and they could not very well afford to pay the duties; and when he said that of course I voted with him. Now, I think I may say to him that the cause of education and of religion cannot very well afford to pay this tax, especially as this case falls clearly within the analogies which we have recognized not only in special but in general legislation, that where an article is manufactured so entirely out of American material that it has to come in for the ornament of the country, and where, so far as it has any benefit at all, it goes for an educational and religious cause which we never tax, it seems to me that there ought to be no question about it. I think that there is no State of this Union which taxes education or religion. This is a tax upon both. The finest bell in the country, not an ornament alone to that institution of learning, but to the whole country. I understand that it is so superior, so extraordinary in its qualities, that it can be heard, the atmosphere being favorable, to a distance of thirty miles. Such a bell is certainly not only an ornament to that institution and the State of Indiana, but to the country generally. I should hope there would be not a single vote against remitting these duties.

Reference was made very admirably by the Senator from Maryland to the services of the Sisters of Charity and Mercy during the war. The Senator from Maine thinks that there are many other persons who have rendered services also of a like kind. Not as a class, Mr. President. Perhaps as a class there are no set of females in the country who contributed more to the comfort and happiness of the soldiers in the hospitals when confined by wounds or sickness than the Sisters of Charity and Mercy.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island is the unfinished business, and is now in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask the Senator to allow that to be laid aside informally to allow the Senate to conclude the naval appropriation bill, which was very nearly finished on a former day. It will occupy only a few minutes, I trust.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to the special order being laid aside informally, especially as I suppose I shall be voted down if I resist the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unfinished business going over informally? If no objection be made, the bill mentioned by the Senator from Maine will be taken up.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to say that there is a bill which I have had in my drawer for a long time, and I have had it in my hand repeatedly, and it is very important that it should be acted upon this week. It is a House bill to regulate the selection of officers of the city of Washington, District of Columbia. It is very important it should be acted on, and I hope I can have the assistance of my friend from Maine in getting it up after the appropriation bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection to passing over informally the special order. The bill mentioned by the Senator from Maine will be taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1869; the pending question being on the last amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to add the following proviso to the second section:

Provided, That the number of apprentices and boys shall not exceed twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion which, strictly speaking, is not so applicable directly to this amendment as to the amendment last preceding, which was adopted in committee and upon which I shall ask a separate vote in the Senate. The Senate adopted the amendment preceding this, putting the complement of the Navy at eighty-five hundred, with apprentices and boys added, upon a misstatement made by me and one or two other Senators as to the number of which the Navy consisted before the war. The information of the committee was, and the statement of the chairman was, and my own statement was, that before the war there were actually in the Navy eighty-five hundred men, and that in addition to that there were a number of boys, thought by somebody who had made a remark upon the subject to consist of about eight hundred. I have now as to the boys there were in the Navy no information more accurate than that which I had the other day. I was informed then, and have been informed since, that in truth there was no such number of boys; but in reference to the rank and file of the Navy I have very definite information, which shows that in truth there never was any such number as is proposed now and as we supposed formerly existed. In a communication which I have from Commodore Smith, the chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, he states that in 1850 there were seventy-five hundred men in the Navy; in 1855 there were seventy-five hundred; in 1860 there were seventy-six hundred. He states, as do the Fourth and Second Auditors, that it is impossible to get at accurately the number of boys without an examination that I could not ask them to make; but the general information is that the number was not so great as was stated the other day.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate will observe that, intending as the Senate did to cut down the Navy, to reduce it certainly to a number as small as that which existed anterior to the rebellion, we are about to add nine hundred men to the rank and file, and twelve hundred and fifty young men under the name of apprentices. It may be said in answer to this, and such is the fact, that the Navy might before the war have been increased to eighty-five hundred. That I understand was the limit; but I am speaking to the fact, which is that it never reached that limit, that the highest number it ever actually embraced was seventy-six hundred. If now we make it eighty-five hundred and add twelve hundred and fifty as apprentices, we make it consist of ninety-seven hundred and fifty, which is more than two thousand more than it ever contained before the war, excepting this indefinite number of boys. I hope when we come to vote on the other amendment in the Senate the Senate and the committee will adhere to what was the original design and leave it as the House did, which would then be in excess of what the complement was before the war.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know exactly how this question stands before the Senate, but I believe it is on the amendment to limit the number of boys and apprentices to twelve hundred and fifty. I understand the Senate has expressed its judgment on striking out the word "excluding" and inserting "including," and decided that it will exclude the boys and apprentices from the total number to be fixed for the effective force of the Navy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was only in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Iowa was not present the other day when the bill was considered as far as it has been. The last vote taken, as he will see, was upon the amendment striking out the word "including" and inserting the word "excluding;" and as I commenced by saying, the suggestions I make are applicable rather to that amendment than to the one which we are now considering. If the view which I now suggest, and which I hope will prevail, shall prevail, the other amendment of the committee will, of course, be rejected in the Senate, so that the bill will stand eighty-five hundred, including the apprentices and boys; and then, if the Senator, understanding the subject thoroughly, as he does, will propose the addition of some words fixing the limits of apprentices and boys, so that we shall understand of how many the rank and file shall be, and to what extent the boys and apprentices shall be added, the design of the House of Representatives will be carried out.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I propose to state to the Senate exactly how I understand this case to stand, and then they can exercise their judgment as to whether it is desirable that the Navy should be cut down below the amount that it stood at before the war, for I understand that to be substantially the proposition. The proposition to reduce it to that number came from me, and everybody, I believe, with whom I conversed thought I made that proposition in a most extraordinary fit of economy and was very much dissatisfied with the proposition; but I confess that it is impossible for me to keep pace with the Senator from New York in matters of economy. The law at the beginning of the war read as follows:

"And the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized to enlist eighty-five hundred men for the Navy instead of seventy-five hundred."

Mr. EDMUNDS. What law was that?

Mr. GRIMES. That was the law of March 8, 1857. He was authorized to enlist eighty-five hundred men, not including boys. The boys were authorized to be enlisted, so many as might be necessary, under an act of Congress passed in 1809, and we have been employing them ever since. There is no limit, and never was, to the number of boys. The Secretary was authorized to and did enlist as many as were necessary for doing chores and assisting in conducting the discipline of the ship.

It is true that up to the beginning of the war we may not have had actually in the service over seventy-six hundred men, just as in the Army we had eighteen thousand men authorized by law, but we never, up to the beginning of the war, had more than eleven thousand actually in service. The reason for this leeway of one thousand men in the Navy and of seven thousand men in the Army is that a sudden emergency may arise which will call for the enlistment of an additional number in order to meet the emergency. We have an example before us now.

In the last three or four weeks the people of Maine and Massachusetts have been down here asking that two ships should be sent on to the northeastern coast, in order to protect the fishermen from the imposition of some extraordinary tonnage duty that the authorities of the British Provinces have seen fit to impose upon the fishermen. I do not know whether those vessels have been sent or not; but suppose the proposition of the Senator from New York should be carried into effect, the result would be that it would be impossible for us to send a man or a vessel in order to protect the commercial interests of the New England States on that coast. Emergencies of this kind are occurring everywhere and at all times.

Mr. CONKLING. Why would it be impossible?

Mr. GRIMES. Because the number of men authorized to be enlisted would be full, and you could not raise another man because you would have your eighty-five hundred men, and you would have them at all times. You have reduced to-day, Mr. President, your squadrons, one would suppose, to the lowest possible estimate, and yet you have in the service twelve thousand three hundred and ninety-five men and boys. I have proposed to reduce this number nearly four thousand men below what it is now.

Then, again, it must be taken into consideration that in 1857, when we fixed the number of men in the Navy at eighty-five hundred, nearly all our vessels were sailing vessels; we had but ten steamers; to-day our vessels are all steamers; and in addition to the men we were obliged to have on our vessels then, we must have coal-heavers and firemen, and they make a very respectable portion of the complement of a ship.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean that it requires more men to work a steamer than a sailing ship?

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Vermont does not seem to comprehend that. I will explain it to him. Our vessels are instructed to sail all the time except during a storm or going in or out of port. They are not authorized to use coal generally, because coal is very expensive; and it makes better sailors and better officers of those who are on board the ship, of the ship's company, if they sail. Therefore, in order to do the sailing, they must have their full complement of men to work the guns and to manage the sails and to preserve the discipline of the ship; but an emergency may arise when it is necessary for them to use their steam power. One of the vessels may be in a foreign port and receive a telegraphic dispatch to proceed immediately and with the utmost celerity to another point. In order to enable her to do that, she must have an additional number of men who are coal-heavers and firemen.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Cannot "landsmen" and "ordinary seamen" shovel coal?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir, they cannot; at least they say they cannot; and these firemen instead of getting fourteen dollars a month, as an ordinary seaman gets, get thirty dollars per month.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was speaking of coal-heavers.

Mr. GRIMES. Coal-heavers and firemen both get additional pay. I have a bill before the Senate proposing to increase the pay of a landsman if he will perform the duty of a coal-heaver in order to avoid additional expense; but it has not yet come under the consideration of the Senate. But you are obliged to have your coal-heavers and your first and second class firemen. They are expensive men, one class getting twenty-five dollars a month and the other class thirty dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether a first-class fireman could not act as a landsman or ordinary seaman when they were under sail, and help to trim?

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, really it seems extraordinary that a Senator living as near to the coast as does the Senator from Vermont should ask a landsman like myself, living in the interior of the continent, to give an opinion on a point of that kind. I supposed everybody knew that a coal-heaver and a fireman were not sailors. A "landsman" is a man who has had some experience at sea.

The ship's company are divided into classes. A seaman is a man who has had at least ten years' experience at sea; an ordinary seaman is a man who has had five years' experience at sea; and a landsman is a man who has had some experience at sea, but he is recruited as a landsman, at fourteen dollars a month. You enlist a coal-heaver at twenty dollars a month. You recruit him for a specific purpose. You cannot say that that man shall perform other duties than those he enlisted for unless you pay him an additional compensation, or unless you are assured that he is capable of performing those duties, which we know he is not. Therefore it is, sir, that more men are required on a steam vessel to-day than used to be required on a sailing vessel before the war.

Mr. President, while I am up I want to say a word upon the general subject. A member of this body came to me the other day in very great alarm, to repeat what he had heard in regard to the extraordinary amount of vessels that we had afloat and the extraordinary expenses that were being incurred by the Navy Department. Why, sir, we have presented here almost every day a printed form of petition got up by some gentlemen—I do not know that I ought to state who—in which it is alleged that the number of vessels in commission to-day in the Navy of the United States is one hundred and three. To make out that one hundred and three they have included coal barges; they have included tenders; they have included old hulks of vessels, out of which the engines have been taken, and which are being used merely for the dormitories of marines at our stations; vessels that are not in commission at all; they have included vessels that are stationed at New Orleans and elsewhere upon which there is only a guard for the purpose of protecting the public property. And this Senator told me that he had been informed that there were thirteen vessels doing escort duty to Admiral Farragut in the Mediterranean sea.

Now, what are the facts? There are five vessels in the Mediterranean squadron, or what is now known as the European squadron. We used to have a Mediterranean squadron and an African squadron. Those two squadrons are now united. We are required by treaty stipulations with Great Britain, and perhaps with some other Government, to keep up a squadron on the African coast. We have four vessels in that squadron now, including the whole of Europe, the Mediterranean, the British waters, the northern seas, and the whole of the African coast as far as the island of St. Paul De Loando, without a single tender or a single steam barge, or anything in the world that is calculated to make additional expense. So it is, Mr. President, with all of our squadrons. It is proposed, I believe, to reduce one or two of them one or two vessels, if we pass this bill, and reduce the number of men authorized to be employed from twelve thousand three hundred and ninety-five, which they now have, down to eighty-five hundred.

We now have in service twenty-seven hundred and eighty seamen, twenty-four hundred and eighty-two ordinary seamen, thirty-nine hundred and sixty-six landsmen, four hundred and forty-four boys, and nine hundred and ninety-six apprentices. The number of boys which the Secretary was authorized to enlist before the war corresponded, I suppose, from what I learn, (for I have not been able to find exactly the number,) with the number of men that were then employed. The naval apprentices, amounting now to nine hundred and ninety-six, we did not have before the war. That is a system which has grown up during the war—established by Congress three or four years ago. It was discovered both in the commercial marine and in the naval marine that the number of sailors was gradually diminishing and that it was almost impossible to secure the service of men who were fit to perform duty on man-of-war-men. It was therefore thought advisable to establish what is known in our service at this day as the apprentice system, picking up boys along the coast and putting them upon old hulks, old sailing vessels, under the charge of naval officers, where they are instructed in the rudimentary branches of education, enlisting them until they are twenty-one years of age, preparing them for the performance of the duties of petty officers on board ship; and in order to encourage this class of young men to enter the service we have said that ten of them shall every year be taken from on board these practice ships and be sent to the Naval Academy, there to be educated as officers.

The opinion of naval officers is that this system has worked admirably. They do not desire that it should be disturbed; and the only purpose I had in view in making this proposition to exclude the apprentices and boys—for that is all there is involved in the whole proposition—was to save this system, to encourage the education of this class of boys for the naval and the commercial marine in the future. Without this proposition, without any amendment, if it had not been for my anxiety to exclude the inference that the apprentices might be included in the number here fixed, the Secretary of the Navy would have the authority to enlist the eighty-five hundred men as he had before the war, and then under the law of 1809 he would have the authority to enlist boys.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are specially mentioned here.

Mr. GRIMES. I say that the section was drawn by myself. I drew this section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is in the House bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I know it is in the House bill, but it is in a Senate bill, too. This section was drawn by myself, introduced by me in a bill into this body. The House took the section out of that bill, changed the word "excluding" to "including," and put it on this appropriation bill. That is the way it came here. My only object in drafting it as I did was to exclude the idea that these apprentices were to be dispensed with or that we were going to do away with that system.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa shall succeed, inadvertently or otherwise, in impressing upon the Senate the idea that it is part of anybody's design to break up the apprentice system, he will doubtless give a damaging blow to the proposition to cut down the Navy. As I wish to reply to the three suggestions that he has made, I commence with this one, and beg the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is now, according to the statements of the chief of the proper bureau, only nine hundred and sixteen apprentices of all sorts in the Navy now upon a war footing. I beg Senators to notice this, that with the Navy as it stands, swollen by the rebellion, according to this statement there are now nine hundred and sixteen apprentices and boys, and no more; and the figures I beg to give to the Senator, if he will allow me; I have them here in detail.

Mr. GRIMES. Allow me to ask the Senator what he means by "a war footing."

Mr. CONKLING. I mean the Navy increased as it has been and as it has remained hitherto in consequence of the war.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, will the Senator permit me to say to him that we have less guns afloat to-day than we had before the rebellion?

Mr. CONKLING. I will permit the Senator to say that, of course, although I do not see what relevancy it has to what I am saying.

Mr. GRIMES. It shows that it is not on a war footing. During the war we had as many as fifty thousand men.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware that we had more men during the war than we have now, and I am aware also that the Navy now consists actually of eleven thousand three hundred and sixty seamen, to which I want to call attention in another connection, for it answers entirely a suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa; but, first of all, Mr. President, let us get right about this apprentice matter. The boys on vessels in commission now are three hundred and sixty-three; apprentices on vessels in commission are one hundred and sixty-one, making five hundred and twenty-four apprentices and boys afloat in the service. Then there are three hundred and ninety-two apprentices on apprentice ships, making in all nine hundred and sixteen apprentices and boys. So the Senate will see that if the Navy is put precisely where it was before the war, at seventy-six hundred, and we retain in the service every boy and every apprentice, whether actually in service or on an apprentice ship, the sum total would be eighty-five hundred and sixteen, just sixteen more than the House of Representatives has allowed. Now, why talk about breaking up the apprentice system? Everybody appreciates, though perhaps not quite so well as the Senator from Iowa, the importance of encouraging, of fostering the apprentice system. Nobody proposes to interfere with it; but the simple question is whether the rank and file of the Navy was in truth extensive enough before the war or whether it is necessary to add to it. Now, let us examine that question for one moment, Mr. President.

The Senator from Iowa says that the Navy might before the war have been increased to eighty-five hundred. So I say; but my point was, that with that permission it had never been found necessary to do any such thing. Why does the Senator think it may be necessary to do it now? He supposes that we may be called upon to send up to the banks of Newfoundland a vessel or two vessels to protect the fishermen. Well, sir, I beg to ask him and the Senate why can we not send them? Is it necessary to enlist fresh men in order to do that? Surely he will not contend that it is. But what will his argument be? He will say, "If we reduce this number to seventy-six hundred men and an extraordinary emergency should arise we shall then need them." Very well, sir; I meet him upon that ground. We have now eleven thousand and odd men in the service, and it is proposed to reduce them to a certain point. If the reduction is made to eighty-five hundred we have all the men actually on the pay-roll, whether we want them or not; and if the proposition of the Senator be correct, the true remedy would be to reduce the actual number to seventy-five or seventy-six hundred, and then provide that in case of emergency more may be enlisted. But I ask the Senator from Iowa whether, following his lead, we are so far to distort the argument as to reduce the rank and file of the Navy to eighty-five hundred and leave those men actually in service, because some emergency might arise which would make it necessary to enlist that number in case the emergency should arise? We now have a larger number than this, and we are taking steps, I repeat, to cut down the number actually in service. When the law he has read was adopted we were enlisting men; the Navy was on the rising scale; and the question then was, in the case both of the Army and the Navy, what should be the maximum to which we might go.

Now, we are on the descending scale. We have more than we propose to retain; we are cutting them down; and if we stop at eighty-five hundred those are the men, not possibly in service, but actually in service. Therefore my point is—and I borrow the argument of the Senator to show it—that in actual experience before the war seventy-six hundred, at the highest point, was all that was necessary. Let us then reduce the Navy to that, and, if the Senator pleases, have a provision by which, in case of emergency, it may go up to eighty-five hundred, but do not let us, upon a peace establishment, put in permanently so many supernumeraries, knowing that they are supernumeraries, to the end that should an emergency arise we shall have them. It will be very much like that woman who made so many foolish purchases on the ground that it was so handy to have them in the family in case they should be wanted; but it is not the true system of economy, and the Senator will not say that it is.

Mr. President, if we agree with the House of Representatives and make eighty-five hundred the sum total of the Navy rank and file, and then provide that every boy now in the service shall be retained and every apprentice shall be retained, and that the number of boys and apprentices shall be kept up to the present number, then we shall have every apprentice and boy that we have now, and as large a Navy besides as we ever had before the war. The question is whether that is not enough. Will any Senator rise and say that it was not enough before the war, or will any Senator make an argument to show that it is not to be enough hereafter except upon some emergency which can be provided for at the time? I have heard no such argument, and I venture to say that we shall hear no such argument, because, upon a somewhat extensive consultation with the officers and persons familiar with this subject, there seems to be no practical answer to the suggestion which I make.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I think the difficulty in this case arises from the fact that the Committee on Appropriations really had no adequate information which either justified or authorized them in proposing any reduction whatever. The Senate will see that when the Committee on Appropriations undertook to say, in addition to providing for the payment of the service absolutely established by law, what that service requires, they have exceeded the bounds of their authority. That is precisely the difficulty in this case; the House of Representatives, in undertaking to provide for the pay, &c., of the Navy, went one step further and said they would reduce the naval force of the country; and that was the question presented to the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate. We found that, instead of merely providing for the Navy proper as established by law, there was mixed with that question the question of reducing the Navy. The first point for us to consider was to what point is it practicable to reduce the Navy. On that topic we had no information; that is, no information which authorized us to act with precise accuracy. That subject of how much, of what the naval service requires, is not a subject which properly belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, and, therefore, we had no information which justified us in fixing the precise standard to which we could go. Then what was the presumption on which we acted? We said that as during the war the Navy had been increased, if we could find the point which existed anterior to the war perhaps it might be presumed that it was safe to go back to that period and go back to that standard.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is your mistake.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am only stating the theory which, in the absence of facts, influenced the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the limit before the war?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will read what it was before the war. In 1857, so recently as that before the war, the Congress of the United States believed it was necessary to increase the Navy, how much? I will read the provision; it is very brief:

"And the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to enlist eighty-five hundred men for the Navy instead of seventy-five hundred."

So recently as 1857 the Congress of the United States did deem it proper, in a time of peace, that the Navy should consist of eighty-five hundred men. Now my honorable friend from New York insists that we should go back of that, on what evidence? None at all; not the slightest; no evidence which the Committee on Appropriations had the right to consider; and I submit that we go back to eighty-five hundred men, only upon the presumption that, it being peace now, the demands of the service are no greater than they were anterior to the war. But the honorable Senator from Iowa, familiar with the business of the committee with which he acts, tells you that the demands of the service are more to-day than they were before the war, from the fact that you have changed the class of your vessels and other considerations to which he has adverted. But, Mr. President, the theory was that we would go back in fact to the basis of that Navy anterior to the war.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that I can safely say that no one of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs except myself is willing that the Navy should be reduced to the limit fixed by the House of Representatives, which I was willing to agree to, from the investigation we had.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa a question, as he is interrupting the Senator from Maine. I beg to inquire of him whether he did not vote the other day in the Senate, and did he not state, as we all did, not that eighty-five hundred was in theory before the war the limit of the Navy, but that in fact the rank and file of the Navy consisted of that number of men? Was not that his impression, as it was mine, when we adopted this amendment in committee and discussed it in Senate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say, in regard to that, that we had no information as to the actual number of men in the Navy; and from the nature of the case it must always be an uncertain standard. I probably spoke inaccurately on that subject; but it was not my intention to confine myself—nor did I have that idea in my mind at the time I was discussing the subject—to the precise number of men on the lists. I was thinking of the legal standard.

Mr. CONKLING. But did you not suppose that the enlistments had actually gone as high as that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir; I think not. I was not certain that I had not said that or used language which justified that inference; and so, while the honorable Senator was speaking, I sent for the report, and I think I shall be justified by the Senate, when I read the report, in saying that I did not mislead the Senate on that point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let me ask the Senator if eighty-five hundred, excluding the apprentices, was not the number prior to the war?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, if we make it inclusive, is not that a reduction from what there was before the war?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly it is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from New York speaks of the matter of fact that, although that was the legal standard, it was not the standard in point of fact. I understand that to be his argument.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That the quota was not filled up?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That the quota was not filled up.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend hardly means to answer the Senator from Indiana what there was before the war exclusive of apprentices, because the apprentice system was adopted after the war began. There was nothing then but boys, powder-boys, as they were called, except the rank and file. The apprentice system is in addition to the peace basis of the Navy, because it arose during the war.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from New York what the powder-boys did differently from what the apprentices do?

Mr. CONKLING. They are distinct classes altogether. The boys and apprentices were and are different. The young men who are apprentices are a different class, both in age and otherwise, from the powder-boys. They may be eighteen years of age. They are intelligent young men, as is implied by the statute, which allows ten of them to go to the Naval School—a different class of persons, with different pay, and a new description altogether, from the powder-boys or powder-monkeys, as they were sometimes called.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not know but that I might have misled the Senate by inaccuracy of expression, and that the honorable Senator from New York was right in saying that I had committed myself to the idea of the actual number of men in the service rather than the limit of the service itself; but to show now that I did not I will read what I said upon that subject when the question was before the Senate on the former occasion:

"I thought, perhaps, to state to the Senate precisely the effect of this amendment, if I can get their attention for a moment. The bill as proposed by the committee, and as it will stand with the amendment, is to reduce the Navy down to the peace establishment immediately preceding the war. I mean the Navy proper, rank and file, which was eighty-five hundred effective men."

Mr. CONKLING. "Effective men."

Mr. CONNESS. That does not mean boys.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That means that we were to go back to the old standard immediately preceding the war. The only difference between the Senator from New York and myself on that subject is that he says we ought to go back to the actual number of men that were in the Navy, and not to that standard which was provided by law, assuming that the actual number in the Navy was less than the number provided for by law; and he thinks I was committed to that in the remarks I made the other day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What standard did the law provide for boys and for apprentices?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It provided just this eighty-five hundred rank and file, and the boys in addition. That is precisely what I understand it provided for. The committee of the Senate in its action undertook to preserve that precisely, to say we will go back to eighty-five hundred rank and file and the boys proper in addition as explained by the Senator from New York, and in addition to that the apprentice boys who have been added under the policy of Congress since the war began. That is precisely the action of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire whether those boys can, in any manner, be regarded as a part of the effective strength of the Navy?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. But they are regarded as the means of supplying the ranks of the Navy?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Entirely.

Mr. CONNESS. Then why should they be included in the proposed reduction at all?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee did not say that they should be; and we have acted on the idea that they ought not to be; but the Senator from New York thinks that they ought to be included, and being included it will not reduce the rank and file so much.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, Mr. President, I desire to ask the exact form of the pending proposition?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me to explain, I believe I can.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly; that is precisely what I want.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Following the recommendation of the committee, the Senate the other day struck out of the second section of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives the word "including," by which it will be seen that the boys were included in the number of rank and file of the effective force. The committee of the Senate, to obviate that, and to have the boys outside of and in addition to the number of the effective force, recommended that the word "including" should be stricken out, and the word "excluding" inserted, and it was done.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that, then, to be the report of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; and then the committee also reported the proviso at the end of the section, which is the amendment now under consideration, that the number of boys and apprentices shall never exceed twelve hundred and fifty, so that if the action of the committee is adopted your Navy will stand eighty-five hundred effective men with a certain number of boys and apprentices added, but never to exceed twelve hundred and fifty in the whole, and according to the statement of the Senator from New York at the present moment they amount to nine hundred and sixteen. If, then, the bill passes in this shape, you will have precisely the force you had anterior to the war, and which was provided for by the act of 1857, with a certain number of boys and apprentices added, but in no instance to go beyond twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, I understand the pending question to be on adding to the section a proviso that the number of apprentices and boys shall not exceed twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; that is the pending proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire whether it is in order to move to strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "seven" in line five of the second section, so that the sense of the Senate may be taken upon the question whether the Navy shall be increased as it stood in fact before the war. If that motion is in order, I will make it before we vote on this other proposition; and if it prevails, it will have the effect of making the Navy as it was before and adding this number of apprentices to it. I will move that amendment now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is that in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now pending must first be determined.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; I hope we shall vote on that.

Mr. CONKLING. I will withhold this amendment until we vote on the pending proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be then in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to point out to the Senate the precise provisions of the apprentice enlistment bill so that we may know whether the apprentices before that time were included within the maximum of enlistments previously permitted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that act is not at hand. I am not perfectly familiar with it. I think the act adding apprentices was in 1863, so that they must have been in addition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not able to find it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have before me one of the acts authorizing the enlistment of boys.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any act authorizing boys since 1837?

Mr. GRIMES. The apprentice act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I want to see. Will my friend from Maine read the act referred to by the Senator from Iowa, if he has it before him?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is—"That it shall be lawful to enlist boys for the Navy, with the consent of their parents or guardians, not being under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age, to serve until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the act of 1837.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then came the act of 1857, which increased the number of men in the Navy to so much. Now, what I want to get at is, whether the act of 1837, permitting the enlistment of boys, under the previously existing enlistment laws, did not, so far as enlistment goes, put them upon precisely the same footing as the men. That is a term which would include male persons of all ages whom the law permitted to be enlisted, just as in the Army persons under twenty-one years of age are permitted to be enlisted; but in the legal common-law sense they are boys, and in fact all men in the Army, when they are invited to fight, are addressed, "come on, boys," or more frequently, perhaps, "go on, boys."

Therefore, Mr. President, it is far from being clear yet that the act of 1857, which increased the force of the Navy from seventy-five hundred to eighty-five hundred, did not include within its limit of eighty-five hundred whatever persons, whether they were boys or men, the law permitted to be enlisted. I cannot find any law myself, but I am not very familiar with the subject, which seems to import any other conclusion; and if that be so, then when we are told by the committee that they thought it safe to go back to the peace establishment of 1860, they have failed to do it by just the amount of twelve hundred and fifty in excess which they provide by their amendment shall be added to the old force of eighty-five hundred; and when we turn to the information derived by my friend from New York, from the Navy Office, we find that in point of fact the total number was altogether below eighty-five hundred in 1860.

So, then, Mr. President, what has been said on the subject of making an increase of the Navy in 1857 from seventy-five hundred to eighty-five hundred amounts to just this: that while by some influence or other, which we have not now the time to investigate, Congress was induced to pass such a law, yet in point of fact the actual number of men was not increased above that number which the law authorized before, which was seventy-five hundred, or only a hundred or so. Is that an argument to induce us to keep up to the maximum of 1860 or 1857, or above that by twelve hundred and fifty? No, because it has appeared in answer to the argument of my friend from Maine, as I have just said, that the act of 1857, which authorized an increase of one thousand men, was totally unnecessary, and that when that came to be put in practice the Navy Department found that it was not necessary to act upon it and that the whole number of men in 1860 was only one hundred above that which the law authorized before 1857.

Therefore, Mr. President, it appears to me that we shall be entirely safe, proceeding upon the same presumption that the Committee on Appropriations proceeded upon; and that is all, aside from this information, we have obtained in going back to the actual standard, and, as I believe, really the theoretical standard, too, of 1857; and that is, the eighty-five hundred shall include the whole number of persons, whether they happen to be under twenty-one years of age or above twenty-one years of age, who are to be kept and enlisted in the Navy. And that, sir, is no attack upon the system of having apprentices. It only limits the whole number altogether; and if it be necessary to have five or six hundred or more apprentices it is only necessary that they should take the place in time of peace of just that number of other persons who would otherwise draw greater pay, to which there can certainly be no objection.

Now, it is said by my honorable friend from Iowa, which is an argument in fact in opposition to the theory of the committee, that it is necessary to have more men now than it was before the war, because now vessels are propelled by steam as well as by sail, and you must have a double complement of men; you must not ask the coal-heaver when he is taking his picnic sail across the Atlantic by sailing to help man the yards, or trim the sails, or scrub the decks, or tear up junk, or do anything else that is to be done by a landsman or an ordinary seaman that is within the scope of his ability; but he is to be regarded as a person entitled to do nothing during all the time that he is not required to shovel coal. I do not believe in that, sir. It is true, as he says, that you must keep your faith with the man; if you have enlisted him to shovel coal, you must not ask him to do anything else; but it is within the scope of the powers of the Navy Department, when the law shall have regulated the whole number who are to be enlisted, to make just such enlistment regulations as they please, and they may therefore make regulations which shall require the shipping articles of a coal-heaver to provide that he shall be turned to other duty when the vessel is not requiring his services in that capacity, and assist in other labors which the vessel requires.

In respect to the ordinary duties, such as our ordinary seamen, and particularly such as landsmen—who are shipped in larger numbers, as this paper shows, which my friend has produced, there being now thirty-nine hundred and ninety-six of that class of persons in the Navy—perform, there is no objection, it appears to me, either as a matter of convenience or any other way, to requiring them to be performed by persons who ship for the special uses ordinarily—the handling of steam machinery. They may attend to these other duties, such as they are capable of, when their services are not required in that particular line of labor. Certainly a man who is fit to be a second-class engineer, or is fit to be even a coal-heaver, a strong and able man, who has been on a ship at all, can perform in ordinary weather, and when he is not required for other purposes, all the duties that a landsman can perform, or substantially all of them, so that there could be intermixed in some small degree with the seamen who are navigating a sailing vessel, men who can perform this service as well as the other. But my friend from Iowa seems to go upon the old Navy idea that no man must be supposed capable of doing more than one kind of work. I do not believe in that; and it is not so, in point of fact, upon war vessels. The sailors—men who are perfectly competent to do everything about the sailing of a ship—are required to man the guns when there is an engagement or a salute; not all of them, to be sure, because some are still required to work the sails; but a man who is a first-rate sailor may be just as good a gunner as anybody else, and frequently is.

Then, I do not think, Mr. President, when you come to study this law, you will find that you are reducing it below the maximum of 1860, or that you are doing any injustice by seeking to do as the House has provided.

Mr. GRIMES. I am inclined to think that I am getting a good deal of valuable information from this debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You stand in need of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIMES. I am satisfied I do. My information has always been that a vessel of war was a great military organization, and that it was just as necessary that it should be thoroughly disciplined and a perfect machine in time of peace as it is in time of war, ready for any national emergency that should call for the exercise of its powers and its duties. I suppose that the purpose of having coal-heavers, firemen, and engineers was to enable that vessel to be propelled in the water or across the ocean and to carry her into action; and that at the time when the men above were manning the guns and devoting all their efforts and all their attention to fighting the enemy the men down below would be required to heave the coals and manipulate the engine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nobody disputes that.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I want to know how the Senator is going to have these men down below performing duty up-stairs in time of action?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you want me to answer now?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend professes to be a little more ignorant than he really is, and I may say a great deal more so. I did not say that a man could be heaving coal in the hold and at the same time discharging a Parrott or any other kind of a gun on the decks. What I did say was—and the same remark will apply to the sailors themselves—that all the men you need on a vessel, provided they have skill enough, are men sufficient to work the ship in action, either when she is working under sail or under steam. If you are fighting in action under steam, as you ordinarily would if you had any wit at all, and I take it the Navy has, the men who in old times would have been managing the sails can now be engineers and coal-heavers, and the men who in ordinary times were managing the sails can manage the guns. You do not have, a complete double set, and never did have, in my judgment, and I think my friend will agree with me.

Mr. GRIMES. My impression has always been that every man had his particular place ready for action, and that a man who ever left that place when the drum beat for action was punished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, nobody disputes that.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, I should like to know how it is possible for a man whose business it is to be a sailor up aloft, ready for action, or to man a gun, can be down-stairs heaving coal or manipulating the engine as you go into action?

Mr. CONNESS. Allow me to make a suggestion. A set of firemen, on a war steamer or any other steamer, who perform four or six hours of duty cannot perform any other duty without a corresponding rest, because they are engaged at labor so exhausting and trying that very often, in the performance of it, they fall dead. That is a very common occurrence on all our sea-going steamers, and to talk about firemen doing double duty is simply to talk about a subject that nothing is known about.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I wish to reply to my friend from California. I am happy to see that he has not fallen dead at putting in the fuel. I will say that to begin with.

Mr. CONNESS. I never put the fuel in, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not maintain that a fireman was to perform double duty at the same time. What I was saying was simply in reply to the Senator from Iowa. He said that by the regulations, and they are wise, coal was only to be used on special occasions, and that a sea-going war steamer was generally rigged with sailing apparatus which she used as a rule. Now, if a vessel is to go, for instance, to join the Mediterranean squadron, it is the duty of that vessel to carry sail and not to use coal as the rule. What I say in reply to my friend from California as to these coal-heavers and assistant engineers is, that while that vessel is making a three weeks' voyage across the Atlantic, carrying easy sail in pleasant weather, it would not hurt those engineers and coal-heavers an atom to assist in navigating the ship with sails, and when she did not choose to use sails it would not hurt them much to go down below and heave coal.

Mr. GRIMES. What I said was that the vessel must be all the time ready for action.

Mr. CONNESS. What the Senator from Vermont has told us now would seem to show that he is a thorough seaman and understands the business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or else that I am a good deal at sea. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Well, sir, the fact is that now the Senator is at sea without either rudder or compass. He tells us that the business of a ship of war, if it wants to go to the Mediterranean, is commonly, as a rule, to use sails. I say it is no such thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I got that from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I am not responsible for it.

Mr. CONNESS. Sails they have as an auxiliary power to be added to their steam power. The business of the vessel is to go to her place of destination, and not to keep her crew rambling about an ocean, where she has no business, at the expense of the nation. The honorable Senator would play off; I find him incidentally trying to throw the responsibility of this statement on the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Sir, he made no such statement. If my friend from Vermont spent more of his time on sea-going vessels, he would understand this business better. What he proposes is to offset the saving in the consumption of coal against the pay and expenses of the entire vessel beside.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, all I have to say is that vessels of war must have their full complement of men, or else they are not fit to go to sea in time of peace, ready for action; and I think it must be demonstrable to the Senate that a steam vessel does require an additional number of men to a sailing vessel, and hence it is that when our Navy is all steam vessels we require a larger service than we did in 1857.

Now, one word in regard to this proposition. I was the only person, I believe, so far as know, among those who had paid much attention to the Navy, who was willing that its personnel should be reduced as low as I have proposed to go; and my reason was principally because I saw that a storm was coming, and I thought it was for the interest of the service to reduce it to this amount at the start, and as a voluntary act, rather than to have my friend from Vermont and my friend from New York come in here and attempt to destroy it entirely, as I was fearful that they or some others might do. Now, what is the proposition really before us? It is simply to increase the Navy, for that is all it amounts to, to authorize the increase of the Navy over and above what it was in 1857 to the extent of the apprentices only.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; not twelve hundred and fifty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not exceeding that.

Mr. GRIMES. The proposition before the Senate increases them to the amount of five hundred and ninety-six persons. You had eighty-five hundred men before the war, and you had the boys before the war, amounting now to four hundred and forty-six. The Secretary was authorized to enlist boys to an unlimited extent. All that we have authorized him to enlist since then is the apprentices, amounting, as I said, to five hundred and ninety-six. That is all really that there is before us, whether or not we shall authorize the Navy to go back to where it was in 1857, with the addition of the apprentices that have been enlisted into the service until they are twenty-one years of age, whom the naval officers regard as destined to be the main reliance of the naval service in the coming future. I am willing to leave it to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say one word in reply to the Senator from Vermont, because he has adopted a mode of interpretation so ingenious and specious that I think it is worth while to notice it. I should like to see whether he thinks it sound. In order to get rid of the force of the argument of the committee, that we go back to the standard of the Navy before the war, the honorable Senator is forced to read the statutes as if boys were one and the same thing with men. He says that it does not appear that the boys mentioned in the statute of 1857 are not identically the men and rated as men in the Navy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say "rated;" I said entered under the general name.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understood the honorable Senator's argument to go to the extent that they were really men, men in the proper sense of the term, that when they are in the Navy they are counted as men. If that is not so, the argument goes for nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I said was to have the chairman of the committee explain to us under these various statutes where the limitation was either upon the number of men or boys, unless it be in the act of 1857, being merely an act for the increase of the Navy by a thousand only. May not the term "men" used in that act, merely increasing the whole number, fairly be considered as applying to the whole force of the Navy as a part of the enlistment law?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is what I understand the honorable Senator to say, and, therefore, he was not clear that the committee was right in saying that eighty-five hundred men, mentioned in the statute of 1857, was the effective force of the Navy, excluding boys.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I want to get at.

Mr. GRIMES. In all the naval legislation from the foundation, men and boys are rated differently.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see the statute.

Mr. GRIMES. Look at the act of 1809.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have the statutes here to show it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I want to see.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. By the act of 1857 "the Secretary of the Navy be and he is hereby authorized to enlist eighty-five hundred men;" and by the statute of 1837, "it shall be lawful to enlist boys for the Navy." I want to ask the Senator if he does not think the enlistment of boys is contradistinguished from the authority to enlist men for the Navy?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer my friend with entire frankness, as I always do. It is impossible to escape from him under any circumstances. [Laughter.] If by the existing law, on the 2d of March, 1837, the total number of persons authorized to be enlisted into the Navy was seventy-five hundred, then I say that the true construction of the act of 1837 did not permit the increase of force by a single man, boy or woman, or anybody else. I wish to call the attention of my friend to the act which that of 1837 was amendatory of, the act of May 15, 1820. If he will show us the act of May 15, 1820, we shall then be able to know whether the act of 1837 was intended to authorize an increase of the force of the Navy, or only to authorize the enlistment of boys as a part of the force that the preëxisting law authorized.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, to show the Senator how these boys are rated and esteemed, what their services are, and that they are distinguished in the service from men, I read from the Naval Register: "Boys, first class," rated not as men, because seamen have twenty dollars a month and boys of the first class have half that price. They are therefore not men, and they do not do men's duty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the point.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the point; I am trying to satisfy the honorable Senator that there is a distinction between men and boys as well in the service as out of the service. A seaman gets twenty dollars a month; a first-class boy ten dollars; a second-class boy nine dollars; a third-class boy only eight dollars; so that I think it is clear that when we speak of men in the naval service we speak of them as contradistinguished from the boys, who are authorized to be enlisted by the several acts which have been referred to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me ask my friend how that same line of argument would apply, as ascertaining the total number that the law authorizes, in the distinctions that exist in the pay between seamen and ordinary seamen and landsmen? There is a distinction in their pay; and yet my friend would not therefore say that a landsman was not a man.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suppose a seaman is a man who has been enlisted and served a certain number of years, and an ordinary seaman is a man of less experience. But, sir, I will not trouble the Senate. Let us have the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, this matter of the apprentices having been disposed of, so that Senators can no longer be beguiled into the idea that they are interfering with the apprentices, I move to amend the second section by striking out the word "eight" in line five and inserting the word "seven;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the number of persons authorized to be enlisted in the Navy of the United States, including seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and mechanics, and excluding apprentices and boys, is hereby fixed and established at seven thousand five hundred, and no more: Provided, That the number of apprentices and boys shall not exceed twelve hundred and fifty.

The amendment I offer now presents pure and simple this proposition. I think I may say with safety that we have now fewer guns afloat than we had before the war, and my impression is, although I do not say that positively, that we have fewer vessels afloat than we had before the war. The letter before me shows that we had in 1860 about seventy vessels in commission. I think the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs will bear me out in saying that that is a greater number than we have now, of vessels afloat, I mean. Now the simple proposition is, having the apprentices and boys, and fixed them where they are, beyond the reach of this amendment, whether we shall put the Navy where it was, and where it was found to be abundantly large before the war, or whether we shall add a thousand men to the Navy without anybody being able to assign a reason for doing it.

Mr. President, let me state that we need not misunderstand each other as to the facts prior to the war; the Navy might have been increased to eighty-five hundred men; but in point of fact the highest number that it ever touched was seventy-six hundred for one single year, and that with more guns afloat and more vessels afloat than are afloat now. The proposition of the amendment is, having fixed the number of apprentices and boys in a way that is satisfactory to those who wish, as I wish, to foster them, that we shall now reduce the rank and file of the Navy to where it was prior to the war, and where it always was with the exception of one year, when it increased that number by only one hundred.

Now, sir, I do not wish to dilate upon it. We have had a great deal of talk here about reducing expenditures, about reducing the Army and reducing the Navy. In this bill the House of Representatives has sent to us a section upon which we are compelled to vote. We cannot avoid it by saying it properly belongs on some other bill. It properly belongs here, because it is before us; and the naked issue is presented whether we will vote to put into the Navy and to keep there so many men as were found sufficient before the war, or whether, without any reason, we shall add to them.

I beg to remind Senators once more that this is to take place upon a descending scale. There are now in the Navy eleven thousand men, and the point is to what number are we to reduce, so that whatever number we fix as the maximum will be found the number of men actually in service, the number of months to feed, of men to pay.

In 1857, when the number was fixed, the existing number being smaller than that, of course everybody understood that only so many men would be enlisted as were found necessary for the occasion. Here the maximum and the actual number, owing to the circumstances, will be identical, because inasmuch as one thousand or two thousand, as the case may be, are to be discharged, of course the reduction will be made only to the point that we fix. Therefore, I repeat again that the only question is, how many men, in truth and in fact, we will pay and clothe and feed? I insist upon it that it shall be that number which the experience of years has found to be sufficient, and not a greater number for which no necessity can be shown.

Mr. GRIMES. All I have to say in reply is simply this: it is true, I think, that we have no more guns afloat and probably not as many as we had before the war. Then, however, they were all afloat on sailing vessels, and now they are on steam vessels; and that makes a very material difference, in the judgment of those who are familiar with the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. We have got a much more extended commerce.

Mr. GRIMES. And we have a much more extended commerce, as is well remarked. Our vessels are more numerous, but they do not carry as large an armament. We are now obliged to keep vessels on the coast of China and in the ports of Japan and the eastern archipelago, going up their rivers, and protecting the commerce of this country in that region of the world at a greater expense than we did before. That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. When the Senator from New York was last up he argued in favor of this amendment by assuming that whatever we fixed as the maximum number of the men to be employed in the Navy would certainly be retained; and to sustain that assumption we were told to remember that it was a declining scale, namely, that we had now eleven thousand or more men, and that when we arrived by general regular process of reduction to eight thousand we would stop there. I hardly think that that is a legitimate course of reasoning. When the law fixes a number as the maximum number it becomes a question of public necessity and public administration as to whether the maximum shall be maintained or not.

It is proposed now that the maximum be reduced one thousand in face of the fact that the ships we employ require a larger number of men, and that the region occupied by our foreign commerce has been very much increased. We have added a coast line of great extent in the new Russian acquisitions. It is suggested by some one near me that that may not prove to be an acquisition. Mr. President, it is an acquisition. It is in our possession, and we have to keep and guard it. Our ships now navigate the Japanese and Chinese waters, and carry their valuable freights, worth millions upon millions of dollars, and we must be represented there by not only numerous naval ships, but powerful ones. We do not know at what time it may be necessary to send an addition to our Pacific and China fleets; and yet it is proposed to fix the maximum by law at a number that would not enable us to do it. Surely we can have no Secretary of the Navy who, if the maximum number shall be fixed at eight thousand men and it should be necessary to employ but seven thousand, would dare to retain eight thousand. I hope, sir, that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DRAKE. There is one point that I should like to inquire about of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as it will influence my vote on this question. Is there any doubt at all, from actual experience, that the number of men on a vessel propelled by steam, necessary to man her, is greater than the number of men required upon a vessel of corresponding tonnage, propelled by sails only?

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt about it; that the number is required to be much greater, just exactly to the extent that it is necessary to have men to manage her engines and to furnish her with the material that is to propel her. A vessel of war, even in time of peace, has to be a perfect military organization, ready for battle at any moment; and, as the Senator very well knows, the man who, in time of peace, is not performing his duty when upon watch is most severely punished, just because they do not know at what moment they may meet an enemy or may be compelled to encounter the elements that may, under some circumstances, destroy the vessel. If she be such an organization as I say, she must be equipped in her hold as well as on her deck, ready to be propelled by steam as well as to fight the enemy that she meets; she must have her full complement.

Mr. DRAKE. I will make a further inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that is, whether the force that is required on a steamer or a steam vessel of war to manage the engines and in connection with the steam machinery is not a force extraneous altogether to that which is required to manage the sails of the ship?

Mr. GRIMES. Of course it is; and, Mr. President, I wish to say further that there is no analogy between a commercial vessel and a war vessel in this regard. A commercial vessel, I have no doubt, would not be compelled to have a complete complement of men, because she would be propelled all the time by steam. She has not a battery to work; she has not got to have every twelve feet sixteen men assigned to every gun, besides the men whose business it is to bring powder and shot to the gun or to carry the wounded men below, or to stand by the plugs to fill up shot holes, or buckets to put out a fire, or anything of that sort.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand the question, and I am about to inquire of the honorable chairman of the committee about it; although I think I do. It is proposed to reduce the whole number to eighty-five hundred.

Mr. GRIMES. The proposition now is to reduce it below that, to seventy-five hundred.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, whatever may be the number fixed—seventy-five hundred. What I want to know is, whether the coal-heavers and the firemen will not be a part of that number?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CORBETT. I suggest that a vessel under steam, performing naval service, it seems to me, should perform more service than a vessel under sail, and therefore it would appear that the same number of men on steamships might perform as much service as the same number of men upon sailing vessels, they being able to make quicker time and visit more ports. It does seem to me, if we are going to reduce the expenses of the Government, that we have got to do it either in the Army or the Navy, and therefore I feel disposed to vote for the proposition of the Senator from New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if there is any doubt about the fact stated by the Senator from New York, that the number of men in the Navy was seventy-six hundred before the war?

Mr. GRIMES. I am not aware that there is any doubt about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That comes from the official figures.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know but very little about this matter except the information given to us here; but it strikes me if we could carry on the mixed service, steam and sailing vessels, before the war, on the basis of seventy-six hundred men, we might carry on the service at present on the same basis.

Mr. GRIMES. But we had not the steam service before the war. That is the trouble. That is the point I make.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is sufficiently answered by the observation of the Senator from Oregon, that on similar service the same number of steam vessels ought certainly to do as effective service.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator from Oregon had known anything about the Navy he would not have made his suggestion. As I have said, a naval vessel must have just as perfect a military organization in time of peace as in time of war. Every man must be ready for action, whether in the tops or by the side of his gun, or by the side of the engine, or heaving coal.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appreciate that; and I admit that the coal-heavers cannot be discharged.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly. Therefore, you must admit that you must add to the number of men you had in the service before the war, the number of men that are now required to heave your coal and to regulate your engines. That number of men, as I have shown, is greater than the difference between seventy-six hundred and eighty-five hundred.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it strikes me the argument is sufficiently clear; if you have a thousand men, that thousand men employed on steam vessels in the naval service are certainly as effective as a thousand men employed in sailing vessels. It is the arm of the service that is improved and increased and perfected. A thousand men still in the steam service, doing the appropriate duties of steam machinery, are certainly as effective as a thousand men in the sailing vessels. I am in favor of testing the question of reducing the Navy and Army, if possible. I shall be willing to vote for a bill to reduce the Army. I am willing to reduce the number of men to the same rate we had before the war. And let me say another thing: we know the Secretary of the Navy will not reduce one man below the amount he is compelled to do.

Mr. GRIMES. This proposition, as it now stands, without the amendment of the Senator from New York, compels him to reduce it four thousand from what it now is.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator says, "Oh, no." I happen to have official information on that subject. It reduces it nearly four thousand. The number now in service is twelve thousand three hundred and ninety-five, according to the report signed by Commodore Smith, now lying on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. That includes the nine hundred and eleven apprentices.

Mr. GRIMES. Everybody.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope Senators will let me finish what I have to say, because I do not wish to make a speech. The Senator from Iowa admits the necessity of some legislation to reduce the Navy, and he has provided to reduce it to the old maximum of eighty-five hundred. He admits the necessity of a reduction, and the necessity of a reduction by legislation, and fixes the old maximum of eighty-five hundred; but it seems to me that, as seventy-six hundred men were sufficient to maintain the honor of the Navy with sailing vessels, the same number of men ought to be sufficient to maintain the honor of the Navy with steam vessels, because while it requires more men to run a steam vessel, yet fewer steam vessels are required to perform the service. As we were able under a wise and economical administration to carry on the Navy with seventy-six hundred men at the highest, certainly we ought to be able to do it now, especially as provision is made for a greater number of apprentices and boys. Therefore, without any knowledge except that derived from the Senator from Iowa and the debate, I shall vote for the lowest number, in the hope that if any harm is done, as a matter of course it is easier to raise the amount of the naval force than it is to decrease it.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not know that I am as well versed in naval affairs as the gentleman from Iowa; and perhaps we do not have as much of the navy in Oregon as they do in Iowa, [laughter;] but it does seem to me that this is a matter of plain common sense. In sailing vessels you must have some men to furl the sails and manage the ship, as well as men to place in action; and viewing the whole case; considering the more effective force in steamships; reasoning as I do from steamships in commercial business, which perform much more service than sailing vessels of the same capacity, I judge that the naval force under steam would perform better service than under sail. I therefore feel disposed to sustain the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. One word in reply to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] He seems to imagine that because we got along with seventy-five hundred men before the war we can get along with that number now. If the Senator will go to his committee-room and refer to the old Navy Registers published before the war he will see that, for example, on the coast of China we used to have three or four sloops of war, each of which had three or four hundred men; and now, instead of having three or four sloops of war on the coast of China, we have seven or eight small steamers that can run up those streams, that can protect our commerce wherever it goes; and it penetrates for several hundred miles, I believe, into the heart of China. Does the Senator suppose it does not require any more men to manage six or eight steamers now on the coast of China than it formerly took to manage three large sailing sloops of war, that did not go into the interior and did not half as well protect your commerce then as it is protected now? The character of your whole Navy has changed; and that is the reason why I insist that the limit that was established before the war is a very low limit, if it is established now. I have a letter from the Navy Department in which they remonstrate against its being reduced as low as I propose to reduce it. They say that if we pass this bill as it stands, without the amendment of the Senator from New York, that they must withdraw a very large portion of each of their squadrons.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the letter.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think I have got it here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not doubt your statement, but I should like to hear what they say.

Mr. GRIMES. I have such a letter as that, and I know they are opposed to this reduction, thinking that they will be compelled to very materially reduce each one of the squadrons that they have now afloat; but everybody knows they are down as low as the Senator from New York admits, lower than they were before the war.

Mr. DRAKE. Before the Senator takes his seat there are one or two points about which I should like to have authentic information.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know whether I can give it or not.

Mr. DRAKE. Is it not true that the average size of the vessels that we have in commission now is much larger than it was before the war? Are they not of greater tonnage, larger size, and requiring more men to man them?

Mr. GRIMES. I think they require more men in proportion to the tonnage than they did before the war. I do not think they are larger than they were before the war, but they require more men in proportion to the size than they did before.

Mr. DRAKE. Did I not understand the Senator from Iowa to say a little while ago that before the war of all the vessels that we had afloat in the Navy there were only ten steamers?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think we ever had ten steamers afloat before the war, unless, perhaps, we had them during the Paraguay expedition, and they were little river steamers.

Mr. DRAKE. Are not all the vessels now in commission steamers?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. I think we had only ten steamers in all before the war, and not more than one or two of them, I think, were in service.

Mr. DRAKE. Now, all the vessels we have in service are steamers, are they not?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; all of them.

Mr. DRAKE. And they require a great many more men than sailing vessels?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. Just as the war broke out we had built the Richmond and Hartford, and one or two more, but they were in a sort of comatose state, I believe.

Mr. SPRAGUE. One idea, I believe, has not been expressed by any Senator in this debate, and that is, that the size of the guns now used is different from the size used before the war. It is well known that a vessel now carrying four eleven, thirteen, or fifteen inch guns has a greater capacity than a vessel carrying seventy-five guns before the war. It is also well known that one thirty-two or forty-four pounder would employ about the same number of men as is now employed upon these very large guns. It is evident, therefore, that the number of men required to be employed upon a vessel of the same capacity now is much less than the number required to be employed upon a vessel before the war.

Mr. GRIMES. I have to say, in reply to that, that there is not a fifteen-inch gun afloat in the first place, and, in the second place, that the number of men to man a gun is exactly in proportion to the increase of the capacity of the gun.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question, being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole,

Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Fowler, Henderson, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Tipton, and Williams—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Ferry, Howe, Harlan, Morton, Stewart, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend the bill on page 8, line one hundred and seventy-six, under the head of "for expenses of Naval Observatory," by striking out the word "two" and inserting "three" before the word "watchmen," so as to give them an additional watchman. I have been called upon by Professor Pierce and other gentlemen connected with that institution, who say it is indispensable that they should have an additional watchman there. The word "watchman" conveys but an imperfect idea of the duties to be performed. The committee had supposed that these watchmen were simply persons to guard the building, but they have other duties, such as making scientific observations during the night, and they are qualified for that service, and the representation is that the service would be crippled without this additional watchman. I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On page 11, line two hundred and forty-two, under the head of "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," I move to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "sixty;" so that the clause will read:

For pay of the civil establishment under this bureau, at the several Navy hospitals and navy-yards, $60,000.

I offer this amendment by the recommendation of the committee upon further consideration. The estimate was $73,365, and the House of Representatives reduced it to $32,000; but the committee are satisfied upon examination that such a reduction would cripple the service to a very great extent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer an amendment to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That all unexpended appropriations existing on the last day of July next for any of the several heads of appropriation provided for in this act shall be carried to the surplus fund, unless the same is necessary to pay expenditures made during the present fiscal year, or unless the same is necessary to execute contracts made before said date.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know who offers that amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have offered it after careful examination and consideration by the committee. The amendment simply makes the same proposition in regard to the Navy that was made in regard to the Army, except that the last clause, the Senator will see, reserves the right to execute contracts, and reserves enough money to execute and complete all contracts.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the proposition as offered and adopted by the Senate to the Army appropriation bill was finally incorporated in the act?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has not yet been agreed upon.

Mr. CONNESS. I am entirely satisfied, from some investigations made by me, that this proposition applied to either of those bills will be a great injury to the public service. The difference between this amendment and the proposition offered of the same class by the Senator from Ohio to the Army appropriation bill is, as he states it, that in this case contracts are excluded. There is a great deal of business going on in the administration of each of those Departments, to be paid from unexpended appropriations, that cannot be included as contracts; and I think that such a proposition as this, without consulting the head of the Department as to the effect of it, is a very injudicious one at least, and I hope it will not be adopted. After the proposition was made to the Army appropriation bill I had some conversation with the Secretary of War, and he said the result of it, if adopted, would be to utterly destroy that branch of the service, and if the gentlemen who had proposed it and voted for it had consulted the Department they never would have adopted it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the debate the other day I have examined this subject carefully, and I assure the Senate there is no practical difficulty in the way. I have submitted this amendment to different members of the Committee on Appropriations around me, and there is no possible difficulty about it.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator if he submitted it—

Mr. SHERMAN. Wait until I get through and then I will answer any questions. It may possibly embarrass the Departments a little by cutting off facilities they have had heretofore of making payments without authority of law. Now, I will recall the facts to the Senate. There are over one hundred million dollars of unexpended appropriations for the support of the Army, for a multitude of heads of appropriations, which they are carrying along on the books of the Treasury Department, and out of which they are paying money never appropriated by Congress. This is caused by the lapping of appropriations during the war made for a great number of purposes not necessary for a peace establishment; and out of these unexpended balances they are paying expenditures that we have no control over whatever. It would have been better at the close of the war to have carried the whole of these to the surplus fund; but it was not done. The amendment offered in regard to the Army has been agreed to, slightly modified, as I understand, by the Committee on Appropriations, and this amendment carefully saves sufficient to carry into execution existing contracts.

To avoid all difficulty I will offer another section as another amendment calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for estimates in his next annual estimates of such balances as are indispensably necessary to carry into execution existing contracts, &c. That next section will enable us to provide for every possible inconvenience. If we do not do this there is no use for appropriation bills, and we had better not go through the farce of passing them. The balances of unexpended appropriation now for the support of the Army are more than twice the aggregate of the appropriations for the support of the Army; and if they can transfer appropriations from one head to another, or lap them over from year to year, the process by which you go through the form of annual appropriations is a simple farce, perfectly idle and futile. They may carry on the operations of this Government without an appropriation bill at all. It is a necessary and high public duty for Congress, seeking to have a proper control over the expenditures, to put an end to these unexpended balances, so that no money can be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of law. One of the greatest guards of the Constitution is the power given to Congress over the public Treasury. No money can be drawn for any purpose from the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation by law.

During the war we made a multitude of appropriations without a careful analysis, without the ordinary checks and restraints that have usually been put upon appropriations, and although the war has been over for three years these have been lapped over and lapped over and continued on the books of the Treasury Department and are now within the control of the heads of the Navy and War Departments. This is an unwise and improper discretion to be left to any officers, however exalted their position, or however pure they may be. The law and the Constitution contemplate that money should only be paid for the War and Navy Departments upon appropriations made by law, and we cannot have our control over the public expenditures until we carry all of these unexpended balances to the surplus fund. Then on the 1st of July next we commence with a new fiscal year. We are now making annual appropriations for the service of the next fiscal year. This section does not commence until the 1st of July, and the reservation is contained carefully that there shall be sufficient appropriations to pay all moneys that has already been expended during the current fiscal year, to execute all contracts made before the 1st of July next, and then the next annual appropriations come in and supply all the wants of the public service.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to inquire what has become of the bill that we passed some days ago on this very subject in regard to carrying over appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. That related only to the Army appropriations, and was attached to the Army bill, and after the bill was passed I understand it was recalled and is now in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. This amendment applies the same thing to the Navy, nothing else; indeed, it is not quite so broad. The amendment I now introduce in regard to the Navy is not quite so broad as was the proposition with regard to the Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am very much in favor of the provision; but why not make one provision to cover all these Departments?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that in certain branches of the public service it might be very difficult. I have another section that applies to all; but as this bill relates only to the expenditures of the Navy I have preferred to put it separately for the Army and Navy. I propose then to offer a section to cover all unexpended balances. Intended to add it to the legislative bill, where it properly belongs; but I will add it as an amendment to this bill with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The principle of that amendment is clearly right, but whether we should adopt it now seems to me not so clear. The Departments have been in the habit of using the unexpended appropriations for the ensuing current year, and, for aught that I know, the estimates that they have sent in have been made upon the faith that they would have the right to use the unexpended appropriations of the current year.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state, if the Senator will permit me, in that connection, that the Secretary of War, in a conversation the other day touching the same kind of a proposition offered by the Senator from Ohio to the Army appropriation bill, and adopted by the Senate, stated that the bounties of the soldiers authorized by our acts were now paid from an unexpended appropriation, and that the adoption as a law of the provision made would prevent their further payment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard that, bagaboo and examined it, and there is not the slightest foundation for it. On the contrary, the language of the provision shows that it only applies to the heads of appropriations contained in the bill. Are there any appropriations in this bill or in the Army bill for the payment of bounties under that act? Not at all. We make an appropriation every year for the payment of bounties, and there is no head of appropriation either in the Army bill or the Navy bill on that subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator how an appropriation for the payment of bounties does apply?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not think I was giving the floor to everybody, although at all times willing to give the floor to the Senator from Ohio, or anybody else who desires it specially.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. CONNESS. I beg pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I said—I do not know that the Senate understood me—was, that I am inclined to think the estimates on the faith of which we are now appropriating have been made what they are because the Departments have unexpended balances of prior appropriations which they have a right to use. They have been using them in the past, and the Senator from Ohio says that they are using them now. Having the right to use the unexpended balances, they have estimated what they shall want for the succeeding year upon the faith of their being able to use during the succeeding year the unexpended balances. I concur with the principle of the honorable member's amendment, that at the end of each current year the balances that remain in the Treasury unexpended, and upon which contracts have not been made, ought to be carried to the surplus fund; but it might be dangerous for the ensuing year unless we know upon what ground to apply the provision to this year.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that this proposition, as applied to some heads of appropriation, would be very desirable and proper; but I do not see how it is going to be made applicable to some. For example, there is an appropriation here of some millions of dollars for the pay of the Navy. A vessel sailed three weeks ago for China and she will be gone three years. The men will only have twenty per cent., for example, paid to their wives, or upon allotment, during the time they are absent, and the balance will be paid at the end of three years when they return. Now, how are they going to obtain that money under this provision?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no difficulty about that, because every year there is an appropriation for the pay of the Army and the pay of the Navy; and whenever that pay is demanded it is due, although it may have been carried a year or two before. The Senator will see that the very language of this bill provides for the pay of the Navy. Now, whether that pay has accrued a year before or two years before makes no difference. Whenever it is demanded it is due.

Mr. GRIMES. But they do not demand it until they return at the end of a three years' cruise; and, when they land in Boston or New York and demand their pay, they will find that it has all been covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no trouble about that, because it has always been done.

Mr. GRIMES. What has been done?

Mr. SHERMAN. They have been paid when they came home, and yet the law forbids an appropriation for more than two years. Now, let me say what I think the Senator from Iowa already knows. The Constitution declares that no appropriations for the Army or Navy shall be made for a longer period than two years. That constitutional provision is entirely evaded by lapping over and opening a new account and carrying it from one account to another. It is for the purpose of avoiding the continued abuse of this system that I offer this amendment. There is no practical difficulty in the case suggested by the Senator from Iowa. When a sailor comes home his pay is given to him. If the Senator really desires to guard against a possible construction of that kind, I have no objection to his making the provision apply to all except the pay of the Navy.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the only difficulty that I think of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, if the Senator really thinks it subject to that construction, to his inserting the words "except the pay of the Navy" in the proper place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think I have information enough with regard to the exact state of things to enable me to vote understandingly on this proposition. I am not willing to take the decided opinions even of my friend from Ohio upon the subject without more knowledge. He says this can be done easily. I am not quite satisfied that it can be without injury. All the large balances that have existed that came from war times ought to be disposed of, as a general rule, by carrying them into the Treasury, and not leaving them open as they are, and I do not think the heads of the Departments would object to that as a general rule. But, sir, I recollect very well, and any one who considers the course of business will see that it must necessarily be so, that in the reports made to Congress with reference to appropriations, we used in time of war to carry over fifty million dollars regularly, probably as unexpended appropriations, at the end of the fiscal year. Everybody will see that appropriations made for a year cannot be expended within the year; it is out of the question. The heads of Departments cannot even know, such is the extent of our territory, what contracts have been made that will require money to be expended. They cannot know what debts may be incurred. They cannot even know for months afterward what the liabilities and the obligations of the Department are under the appropriations; and, therefore, I am not quite certain that the exceptions made by the honorable Senator would be such as would be of any practical value, would effect anything. We make certain appropriations for a year. The practice has been, of course, to expend as much as is called for within the year, but a very large portion must necessarily go over into the next year before it is called on for the obligations that have been incurred of one kind and another.

I think what the Senator wants to get at is to prevent transfers—transfers from one head of appropriation to meet another appropriation where the money falls short. That has always been a matter that has occasioned discussion here in the Senate. I remember as long ago as when I was first on the Committee on Finance it was a matter that was introduced and considered once or twice. Mr. Hunter, who was then chairman of the Committee on Finance, and who was very careful and anxious to cut down every possibility of misappropriation of the public money, examined that subject once or twice, and he found that in the War Department and in the Navy Department—the War Department especially—you could not get along at all unless you allowed transfers to a certain extent; and it first arose, I think, on an appropriation bill where a transfer was allowed. I have not looked it up for a good many years now, and I should not know where to look for it.

While I agree with the general object of the amendment, I am not satisfied that it would be safe to pass it in the form in which the honorable Senator has introduced it. I think that such an amendment can only be prepared safely by consultation with the heads of the Departments, and a careful examination at the Departments themselves to see how it would work. A general proposition of that sort—unless the Senator will assure me that he has made that examination in connection with the heads of Departments—is not so satisfactory to me as to enable me to vote for it. I think there will be danger of its occasioning difficulty. While, therefore, I am in favor of the object, I think it is not to be obtained without a more thorough and careful understanding of the facts than the Senator or anybody else has yet furnished to me at any rate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to an existing statute, to see wherein his proposition differs from the law as it already stands. By the tenth section of an act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1853, and for other purposes, approved August 31, 1852, it is provided—

"That where any moneys shall have remained unexpended upon any appropriations by law, other than for the payment of interest on the funded, or the payment of interest and reimbursement according to contract of any loan or loans made on account of the United States, as likewise moneys appropriated for a purpose in respect to which a larger duration is specially assigned by law, for more than two years, after the expiration of the fiscal year in which the act shall have been passed, all and any such appropriations shall be deemed to have ceased and be determined, and the moneys so unexpended shall be immediately thereafter carried, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the account on the books of the Treasury denominated the 'surplus fund,' to remain like other unappropriated moneys in the Treasury, and it shall not be lawful, for any cause or pretense whatsoever, to transfer, withdraw, apply, or use for any purpose whatever any moneys carried as aforesaid to the surplus fund without further and specific appropriations by law."

My inquiry is whether the Senator's amendment changes that statute in any respect whatever except the limitation to one year? It seems to me it does not.

Mr. SHERMAN. The section to which the Senator refers is called the "surplus fund section" of the statute, and is perfectly familiar to me. But the trouble is that that statute and the operation of the surplus fund have been avoided by the mode of keeping the accounts, and the fact is shown clearly enough by the estimates of appropriations submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, by which it appears that $144,000,000 of appropriations made during the war are still continued subject to the order and requisition of the heads of the different Departments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They ought to be carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very purpose of this provision. Now, I wish to assure the Senator from Maine that this subject has come under his consideration as well as my own, and has been fully considered. At the last session of Congress we proposed this something in the Committee on Finance, to cut off these balances of appropriations. The proposition was made and debated, and the attention of the Secretary of the Navy was called to it, and he said that it ought not to be done without notice, because the estimates for that year were made upon the basis that they had the right to use a portion of the unexpended balances, and therefore it would take them a good deal of time to revise their estimates in order to make them complete for a year, but that he would do so.

Now, here is his letter written a year ago, showing that he has had ample notice of the intention of Congress to move in this matter; and by referring to the estimates that are now on your table you will find estimates complete for the Navy Department, for every item of expenditure falling within that Department, giving the details in full; so much for the pay of the Navy, &c. In these estimates he does not allude to the unexpended balances of appropriations, but makes the estimates complete; and in the bill as it now stands there are appropriations for all the proper heads of appropriation for the Navy Department complete in themselves; and there is no doubt those estimates are based upon the idea that they are complete for the service of the Navy Department for the next fiscal year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask, does not the law require the Secretary, in making his estimates, to take into account the unexpended balances applicable to the service he is to execute?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The amount of the appropriations for the support of the Navy by this bill, I am informed, is something over twenty million dollars. They are carefully limited and carefully reduced. Some of the old heads of appropriations are not named in this bill, and consequently the section I offer does not apply to them. It only applies to the heads of appropriation that this bill proposes to furnish means for. There are to the credit of these very heads of appropriation now, according to the estimates, $15,226,264. It is very convenient for the head of a Department to have this large reserve, which he may call for if he chooses; having a fresh appropriation for all the items necessary to carry on his Department the next year, to have the power to draw at pleasure from these unexpended balances, the items of which are not given, but only the bulk.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, is his amendment simply confined to existing balances?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose there is a balance of the present appropriations that we have made for this year. We made appropriations last year. At the end of this fiscal year there will be a balance on hand of the appropriations made last year; that is to say, made for the existing fiscal year. Does not this amendment carry all those balances into the Treasury just as well as the others?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it keeps them open just precisely as is always done in the Treasury Department until the service of this fiscal year is settled. It may take six months, as the Senator knows.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may take two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; suppose it does; for all the debts contracted during this year that balance still stands and cannot be used for any other purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty is, you cannot tell what that balance is until after the lapse of a considerable time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but it still stands on the books to the credit of that head of appropriation until the accounts of this year are settled. If, in the case put by the Senator from Iowa, debts that were incurred this year should come in two years hence, this proposition does not affect them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I do not see how the Senator's amendment changes the existing law a particle, except so far as the old balances are concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. It carries the whole of those old balances to the surplus fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All the old balances ought to go there, except the balances of the year before last and last year. As the law stands now, the idea is that the balances may stay on the books for two years and then they go into the surplus fund. I should think that all those balances in the War Department would, under the law as read, go into the surplus fund now.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator will see that that law has been entirely avoided, because here is the report.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then this will be in the same way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because they do it by simply stating the accounts. This amendment declares that all the money appropriated before this time, unless that money is necessary for such and such a purpose, shall be carried to the surplus fund. The law has been defeated by opening a new account and carrying the unexpended balance to the new account, and adding to that the new appropriation, and so on lapping it over year after year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is an evasion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it is an evasion, and it is for the purpose of correcting it that I offer this proposition. I am not sure but that during the war, when this practice arose, it was necessary, because then they had to have large sums at their discretion, as there were sometimes deficiencies in heads of appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator, by way of amendment, that I think might relieve the embarrassment which the Senator from Iowa anticipates. I see he has provided here that the surplus necessary to execute existing contracts shall not be carried into the surplus fund. Now, the Senator from Iowa suggests a difficulty that it may be necessary to execute a service already provided for.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the first clause will cover the case suggested by the Senator from Iowa entirely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to suggest an amendment, and see whether it will be satisfactory to the Senator from Ohio. I suggest that he add, after the concluding words of his amendment, "or unless the same is necessary to execute contracts made before said date," the words "or for the continuous service appropriated for."

Mr. SHERMAN. That will defeat the whole law, because an appropriation is made say for pay of the Navy or for any given head of appropriation, and this proposition continues that for that particular purpose. Now, you have already cut off the power of transfers. That is all right enough. That has been done already by law. But until you cut off these large balances you will have all the evils of the old system continued. There is not a single head of appropriation provided for in this bill that there is not a large balance to the credit of. I make the general assertion because I know it is so as to the great body of them. I am willing that those appropriations shall still stand to the credit of those heads of appropriations on the books of the Treasury Department for the purpose of settling up all accounts or dues accruing during the present fiscal year whenever they may be presented, or to execute all contracts made during the present year, but not for the purpose of swelling or increasing the appropriation that we say is sufficient for the public service of this year. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I will say that this clause is amply sufficient for his purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I am satisfied with it as it stands, if I understand it. It reads:

And be it further enacted, That all unexpended appropriations existing on the 1st day of July next for any of the several heads of appropriations provided for in this act shall be carried to the surplus fund, unless the same is necessary to pay expenditures made during the current fiscal year, or unless the same is necessary to execute contracts made before said date.

Who is to determine that? The Secretary of the Navy, I suppose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; as a matter of course, upon his requisitions, countersigned at the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I ought to say that I have a letter here, which I should like to have read, from the Assistant Secretary, against this proposition. I will say, at the same time, that it seems to me there is nothing very objectionable in it, if the discretion is lodged in the head of the Department as to whether it is necessary to retain those balances in order to pay existing contracts or continuing contracts or liabilities already incurred; but the Assistant Secretary of the Navy has written me a letter expressing his objections to it, and I think it proper that it should be read. I will ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, April 6, 1868.

DEAR SIR: As suggested in our conversation the other day, I will state the effect upon this Department of a proviso similar to that added to the Army bill—which I have learned might be added to the Navy bill—relative to any balance of funds existing on the 1st of July.

In the Army there are two classes of pay officers: the paymaster proper, who pays the personnel only, and the quartermaster, who pays for supplies, &c. In the Navy, as you are aware, both are combined in one. The Army paymaster every month or every two or three months pays a regiment in full to the date of payment, and thus the Army is fully paid for any given year within a short time of its close. Not so the Navy. Seamen are often absent for three years, and during that time are rarely, if ever, fully paid up; they are given only what is required to meet their necessary expenses, and so they come home with the fragments of pay of one, two, or three years due them. If this is to be dissected, and the balance for each year defined and charged to the appropriation for that particular year, it will create great confusion, and the additional work in the Navy and the Auditors' offices will require a regiment of clerks, and not the slightest public good would be gained thereby. If there stands to the credit of pay of the Navy $50,000,000 it amounts to nothing—it is all upon paper—the actual payments are no more and no less.

There are over a hundred heads of appropriations for the Navy and little expenses which cannot be foreseen, and funds provided under the proper appropriation are constantly arising, and are necessarily paid for by the paymaster from any funds in his possession, and upon his return and the settlement of his accounts, years after the expenditures were made, the proper appropriation is debited by transfer warrant from the auditing office, as is provided by law. If, therefore, the balances of appropriations are wholly wiped out, as is provided by the amendment to the Navy bill which passed the House, (and I believe, been rejected in the Senate,) these accounts could never be settled, and if they have to be charged to the distinct year's appropriation the labor will be enormous. All regular appropriations have since the foundation of the Government been considered as continuous—unused special appropriations lapsing to the Treasury after two years.

As suggested, also, I call to your attention the reduction in the appropriation for the support of the hospitals.

Very respectfully, WILLIAM FAXON.
Hon. J. W. GRIMES, United States Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My colleague read a section which had escaped me, if I knew anything about it—I do not know when it passed—prohibiting all transfers from one head of appropriation to another. Is that the law, that all transfers are forbidden? When was that passed?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We passed an act at this session forbidding all transfers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What act was that? What was the character of the act? One of the appropriation bills?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; on one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Which one was it?

Mr. GRIMES. On the deficiency bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The first deficiency bill?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was not aware of that; but, if it is now the law that all transfers are prohibited, no possible harm can follow by letting things remain just as they are. This matter, as the Assistant Secretary of the Navy suggests, is merely upon paper. The money is in the Treasury, and nothing can be drawn out except in the payment of regular bills as they come in. I cannot see what necessity there is or what is to be accomplished by the amendment, because the Secretary cannot lay his hand upon a dollar of the appropriation except in payment of some bill that arises.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give a case to the Senator where the difficulty has actually occurred. I wished to ascertain during this session of Congress the probable expenditures for the next fiscal year. How could that be ascertained under our present system of conducting business since the war?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see how you could ascertain it by putting this clause in.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, I will state to the Senator how I can do it, if I do not interrupt him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly not; I merely rose to make a suggestion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ascertain the amount of money necessary for the next fiscal year in order to provide ways and means to raise the money. I look at the estimates of appropriations; I find how much is estimated; I have the estimates of the various Departments and the Secretary of the Treasury that so much is needed; I call upon the committees of the two Houses, and I find that they have reduced the estimates somewhat and fixed such an amount for the expenditure of the next fiscal year. But I am met with the remark: "That is no test; that is no criterion; that is not within one hundred million dollars of it." Why? Because there are old balances of appropriations that have been carried over and are lapping over like a snowball in winter, and you cannot tell how much of those will be used.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Are they not reported regularly as so much in hand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Only in bulk.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not in detail?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the Senator can get at it by calling for a detail, for a statement of how much there is under each head, when the appropriation bills come up, and the Committee on Appropriations can make their appropriation bills accordingly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator must have forgotten, I think, what occurred on this subject a year or two ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very likely.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because this very subject was then considered by the Committee on Finance, and I am quite sure my friend from Maine agreed to it. We proposed to cut off these unexpended balances. I thereupon wrote an official letter to the Secretary of the Navy, and he stated as a reason why it could not be done that year that the annual estimates had been made upon the supposition that they would be able to use a portion of these large balances; and so it was postponed that year; and this year they have changed the form of the estimates, no doubt in consequence of that inquiry, and given complete estimates for the Navy Department. They have been somewhat reduced. There is now, it seems to me, no objection, no practical difficulty in carrying these unexpended balances into the Treasury unless it may arise in the pay of the Navy. I think the exception already made by me is sufficient to cover that; but, as I said before, if the chairman of the Naval Committee thinks it is not, I am willing to except the pay of the Navy from the operation of this provision. I do not think it is necessary to do so, because I think it is sufficiently excepted by the general provision, "unless the same is necessary to pay expenditures made during the current fiscal year." As to keeping the accounts there is no practical difficulty, because only the balance is paid and charged to the proper appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer another amendment, to which I think there will be no objection. It is to add as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, in his next annual estimates of appropriations, to state all the balances of appropriations made prior to the present session of Congress for each branch of the public service and remaining unexpended on the 1st day of July next, and designate the amounts necessary to execute contracts or pay expenditures properly chargeable to each of such balances.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not make that continuous?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have already provided for the Army and Navy appropriations; but as there are a multitude of other appropriations for the Indian service and other services, I thought it better to make this provision requiring an estimate to be submitted in the next estimates of appropriations of the amounts actually necessary to complete contracts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My inquiry was, why you do not make that section apply in the future continually instead of only to his next report?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this other section will cut it off sufficiently, and then we shall be able to legislate in view of the estimates, cutting off all that is not necessary to complete contracts or carry out an existing law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be a great deal better to make it continuous.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the Senate in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The question will be taken on the amendments collectively unless some Senator desires a separate vote.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish a separate vote on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted.

Mr. HOWE. I wish a separate vote taken on the amendment increasing the appropriation made for Navy hospitals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted. The question is on concurring in the Senate in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, except those that are specially excepted.

The amendments not specially excepted were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the first excepted amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment, which which was in line two hundred and forty-two, under the head of "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery" to strike out "thirty-two" and insert "sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of the civil establishment under this bureau, at these several Navy hospitals and navy-yards, $60,000.

Mr. DRAKE. That is not the amendment on which I asked a separate vote.

Mr. HOWE. It is the one on which I asked a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment being the first one in the bill will be considered first. The question is on concurring in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. The estimate I think was something like $70,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Seventy-two thousand dollars.

Mr. HOWE. The House of Representatives cut down the estimate to $32,000. I admit that it is not very easy to estimate accurately the precise sum that is needed for these purposes; but in looking at the figures submitted by the Department, and looking at the best evidence I could get on the point, it seemed to me that the appropriation made by the House was abundant for the purpose. It is suggested already that I am mistaken, and perhaps I am. The number of employes at these different hospitals is something over two hundred. The amount of work they have to do is indicated in the report of that bureau, showing the number of persons in these several hospitals at two different dates a year apart, the 31st December, 1865, and the 31st December, 1866.

The whole number of persons in the Chelsea hospital on the 31st December, 1865, was thirty-seven; the year following it was fifty-six. In New York it was one hundred and fifty-six; and the year after it was one hundred and fifty-four. In Philadelphia it was sixty-four; and the year after it was nineteen. The whole number in all the hospitals in December, 1865, was four hundred; and in December, 1866, it was just thirteen less—three hundred and eighty-seven.

Now, you will perceive, Mr. President, that if this is a fair average of the number in these hospitals, you have almost one employe to a patient. That seems to me to be very extravagant. Nay, I guess you have more than that if you take into consideration the navy-yards. Here are half a dozen navy-yards at which appropriations are made for hospital purposes. Here is $1,480 for hospital expenses at Washington; but there is a hospital at Washington. It does not appear from this report that there ever was a patient treated there in the world. And so of the navy-yard at New York, at Philadelphia, at Norfolk, and at Boston. There are hospitals at each of these places, and yet appropriations are made for hospital expenditures at the navy-yards at the same places. It seems to me if the Government maintains one hospital at a place, that should be sufficient for all purposes; and it would seem to be sufficient from the reports, because I do not gather from them that there ever was a patient treated at either of these navy-yard establishments, whatever they may be.

But, is this number of employes necessary to do the work? Why, sir, the number of employes in the hospital at Boston is twenty-eight. The number of persons admitted to that hospital in the year 1866 was two hundred and eighty-eight. The number of employes at New York is thirty-nine. The number of patients admitted to that hospital in 1866 was five hundred and seventy-two. The number of employes at Annapolis is eight. The number of patients admitted to that hospital in that year was five hundred and ninety-six. A larger number of patients was admitted to the hospital at Annapolis in that year than in any other hospital in the whole catalogue; and yet the number of employes is only eight, or about one fourth of the number employed at some of the other hospitals, and about one fifth of the number employed at New York. If eight persons could take care of the sick admitted into the hospital at Annapolis, will some Senator tell me why thirty-nine are required to take care of a less number at New York? If eight persons can take care of the sick at Annapolis, they can take care of them evidently at any other hospital, because there was a larger number admitted into the hospital at Annapolis than into any of the other hospitals.

I find that in most of these hospitals, or in many of them, there are no less than three apothecaries under pay—apothecaries and assistant apothecaries of the first or second or third class—three apothecaries to put up medicines. It takes three men, or you pay for three men, to put up the medicines for one hundred and fifty patients in the New York hospital; two to put up the medicines for the patients in Boston; and so of the other hospitals. Now, I should think one good, smart apothecary could put up more medicines than that number of patients would readily take. I have seen one surgeon that I think could put up enough to kill the whole of them, and not work over half the day at that. [Laughter.]

There are also three cooks and a farmer at most of these hospitals. A farmer I should think about as useless a piece of furniture in an hospital as you could well contrive; but you have one designated as a farmer, and as under pay. Then you have three nurses, three washers, four laborers, a gardener, a painter and glazier, a gatekeeper, three watchmen, one messenger, a matron, an engineer, and a carpenter. That is a corps that I should not mistrust were required on the staff of an hospital, to a certain extent, but it is a force that it seems to me it is impossible should be employed. I am satisfied if you adhere to the appropriation made by the House of Representatives you can furnish more help at every one of these hospitals than the Annapolis hospital has, and the Annapolis hospital received under its treatment during this year more than any other hospital in the country. Therefore, I felt inclined to call for a separate vote on this particular amendment. I was not in the Senate when it passed before.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One word in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin. I think it difficult to reply to the criticism of the Senator in detail, for it may turn out that the Senate will find it difficult to believe that all these establishments at these various points are necessary; but that is not the proposition before the Senate. If it was a question whether we would establish and maintain these hospitals or not, then the argument of the Senator would be relevant; but we have got these establishments, and the Committee on Appropriations have no judgment on the question whether they ought to be sustained or not. The presumptions are all in favor of the institutions.

The argument of the Senator is that they ought to be conducted upon more economical principles; that there is a surplus of help. There are fifteen establishments in all for which this appropriation is made, and the aggregate is $60,000 for maintaining fifteen hospital establishments in different sections of the country. Now, I will read you the force for which this appropriation is made, and let any Senator, if he pleases, including the Senator from Wisconsin, tell me if he can which one of the employes can be left out. He has seized one particular one, which I will take notice of directly.

Now, take the hospital at Boston, Massachusetts. It is an establishment under the Government; and the question is of making an appropriation to pay the employes. I want you to notice the employes, their duties, and their compensation, and see whether it is too much or too little. There is "one apothecary, first class." His duties are not defined; but his compensation is. It is $750 only. There is a second class apothecary at $480. I believe there is a third class apothecary at New York at $360; but there are only two at Boston.

Now, if you take the sums you will see that they are not persons employed independent of this hospital in some way. You cannot conceive that you can find a competent apothecary for $480. My friend says he knows a physician who could do all the services of the three apothecaries and have plenty of time to spare; but he could not employ one competent physician to do the duties of an apothecary at those establishments for the salary of all three combined. I only mention it to show that a low grade of service and skill is employed and very low compensation paid.

Then, there is a carpenter at $360; a chief cook at $240; two cooks at $168 each; one engineer at $600; one farmer, $480; two firemen, $360 each; one gardener, $300; four laborers, $240 each; three washers at $168 each; one matron, $360; one messenger, $240; three nurses at $240 each; one painter and glazier, $360; one gate-keeper, $300, and three watchmen, $360 each. Now, if you keep an establishment of this sort, whether you can dispense with these persons or not does not depend on the number of patients actually in the hospital. You must maintain the establishment, because you are liable to have more or less enter there at any time. So that the criticisms of my honorable friend go against the establishment altogether.

But the Senate committee adopting the argument of the Senator, so far as it touches this case, did cut the appropriation down. The appropriation necessary to maintain all these persons intact is $72,360. It will be seen that the amendment of the committee is $12,000 less; and that was based upon criticisms such as my friend from Wisconsin has addressed to the Senate. Looking at these establishments, and seeing, as is suggested by him, that it is possible there may be a surplus man or two, a surplus apothecary, and perhaps a surplus laborer, the committee have cut down the whole estimates $12,000; so that the bureau will be required to discharge some of these persons. Now, can my honorable friend say that they can dispense with more than one half? That is the House proposition.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, I can.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. More than one half?

Mr. HOWE. Yes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has my honorable friend any information on that subject?

Mr. HOWE. Yes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does he know about the establishments?

Mr. HOWE. Why, yes, Mr. President, let me say to my friend what evidence I have. I have the evidence here of this report, that the hospital which received the most patients during the year 1866 at Annapolis does the work with eight employes, while you are paying in this bill for from twenty-five to thirty-nine employes—

Mr. RAMSEY. In the same hospital?

Mr. HOWE. In other hospitals doing less work.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That does not argue anything.

Mr. HOWE. I thought it did.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the argument is not conclusive, because take this one at New York: the entire establishment at New York costs but $12,000; but if it was necessary to keep an establishment there for the reception of sailors and marines, it seems to me it is very difficult for the Committee on Appropriations to say that it can be done much under the estimates presented to us from the proper authorities.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, it is just as easy for us to vote $60,000 as $32,000. We can do it by the same motion of the hand or the same word of mouth; but when the Department shows you that eight men do a certain amount of work at Annapolis, treat a certain number of patients, and take care of them, I thought, with all deference to the opinion of my friend from Maine, that that was an argument which tended to show that less than thirty-nine could do less work at New York and less than twenty-eight could do it at Boston or Chelsea.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask my friend whether the establishment at New York is not much larger than that at Annapolis, and whether it does not require a larger force to take care of the building and the appurtenances thereto belonging; whether, in fact, the accommodations there are not sufficient to take care of a much larger number of patients in case any emergency should arise requiring them to be taken care of?

Mr. HOWE. What the relative size of the two establishments is I am not informed.

Mr. GRIMES. I can tell the Senator that the size of the one at Annapolis is four ordinary-sized rooms, about sixteen feet square, I believe.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I suppose the one at New York is much larger.

Mr. GRIMES. I never saw the one at New York; but I understand it is quite a large building, and it ought to be, and must be, because it is adjacent to a large city where we are liable to have a large ship come in with one hundred sick people in a day, and have got to be in a condition to receive them at any moment they may come in.

Mr. HOWE. Well, sir, I know a ship is likely to come into New York with a hundred sick persons on board; and I suppose a ship is liable to come into Annapolis with sick persons on board. It seems they do come in, and did come in, and bring more patients—

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; none of the patients at Annapolis come in by sea.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know where they come from. They get there; and I do not suppose it makes any difference in particular whether they come by land or water. They probably require about as much nursing and about as much treatment. I am only giving you the report of the Department.

I was trying to say I did not know the relative size of the two institutions, that at Annapolis and that at New York. If these people are employed just to take care of the building then I have a very prompt remedy for that, which is to destroy part of the building. You do not use it. The use you find is for the four rooms at Annapolis, and not for the castle in New York. Cut down your building; discharge your employes. If they are employed to take care of the sick, the sick are at Annapolis, or were during this year at Annapolis.

I thought that this was an argument why a less number of persons were required at the other hospitals. I thought there was another argument. I thought the very facts to which our attention has been directed by the chairman of the committee, to wit, that these were very cheap hands, was an argument going to show that no such hands were required. They do not employ any such apothecaries as are spoken of here at the figures. They do not get this at the price named. I take it they are not there, because they cannot be hired for that, I think. I would hate to trust myself in the hands of one of them who could be hired at those figures.

The Senator appealed to me to say which one of these employes I would think it safe to discharge. I will tell him. It is a fair question. I will give him my opinion, with such information as I have—it is very limited—drawn from the report. I would discharge the whole batch of apothecaries early in the morning.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Would not the Senator be willing, if a little ground be attached to these hospitals, that it should be carried on so that they could furnish their own vegetables?

Mr. HOWE. No. I would not employ a farmer and a gardener to carry on any of the public domain; I do not care whether it is attached to a hospital at New York or whether it is out on the prairies in the West. I do not believe we had better do it. I would discharge all the apothecaries and the carpenter and the farmer and the gardener, and I think I would reduce the number of washers and laborers; but I am not sure about that. I think I should try to get along with less than three watchmen in an ordinary hospital. I do not believe they are necessary. I think I should try and get that number down to the number that is employed at Annapolis.

Mr. RAMSEY. As the Senator from Wisconsin seems to have informed himself on this subject, I should like to ask him a question to see whether his opinion agrees with mine. I am told that if this reduction of the appropriation for the hospitals takes place several of the largest hospitals in the country will have to be closed. While I am in favor of reducing the appropriations for the Navy, I should be very sorry to commence at this end of them. I am willing to vote for any amendment involving the reduction of the men in the Navy; but I should be very sorry indeed to see the naval asylums or naval hospitals interfered with, unless there be an absolute necessity for it, and I am told if this reduction takes place several of the largest hospitals in the country will have to be closed.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I make it a point never to speak unless I have something to say, and never to say anything unless I know something about the subject. It has been my duty in my lifetime to examine some of these marine hospitals officially.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These are naval hospitals.

Mr. CRAGIN. I find, sir, that I am mistaken. I will say, however, that I once had occasion to examine the hospital at Portland and the hospital at Chelsea, in Massachusetts, and I supposed, from the debate I had heard on the subject, that those were the class of hospitals referred to in this bill.

Mr. WILSON. The one at Chelsea is.

Mr. CRAGIN. Then it seems I am not so much mistaken.

Mr. DRAKE. I should like to inquire whether the Senator from Wisconsin, in the remarks that he made on this subject, was in any better condition than the Senator from New Hampshire? [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAGIN. I thought I was right when I commenced; but being told by some older Senators that I was probably incorrect I concluded to take my seat. But some five years ago I had occasion officially to examine the hospital at Chelsea, Massachusetts, and I can assure the Senator from Wisconsin that it is a very different establishment from the one at Annapolis. It is a very large building, probably containing at least one hundred rooms, and there are there many permanent patients, sailors who are suffering with chronic diseases and who stay there through the year.

Mr. HOWARD. How many?

Mr. CRAGIN. I should say about one hundred permanent patients, and then there are others coming and going. In the case at Annapolis, although the number may be five hundred, as the Senator reads from some report, they were probably temporary patients that came there for a day or two with only some little ailments, and a few men could take care of them and they were soon away, and others came. But at Chelsea many of the patients are permanent, and the establishment has to be maintained on a permanent basis. There are several acres of land; the establishment is a very fine one; the land is kept in fine shape, and it is a credit to the Department. There is very great reason why that establishment and the one in New York, which, I presume, is superior to that at Chelsea, should require a much larger force. I found in my examinations that the number of patients treated upon Cape Cod was greater than the number at Chelsea hospital, but they were treated only for a day or two perhaps, and the expense was very small. This little four-room hospital down at Annapolis can easily be taken care of by eight or ten men; but it was one part of my duty to go to the Chelsea hospital and examine and see whether the force could be reduced, whether there were more men employed there than were necessary, whether their salaries were higher than it was proper should be paid. My report to the Treasury Department, according to my recollection, shows that there was no greater number than was necessary. I thought the institution was managed with great economy and with great credit, and I still believe it.

I hope these appropriations will not be cut down, Mr. President. These sailors pay out of their monthly pay a certain sum that goes to make up the general fund that supports them when they are sick. These hospitals are built by the Government, and the mere personnel of the establishment is supported by the Government; but the great amount of the money that goes to support these sick sailors they pay themselves out of their monthly pay.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is quite mistaken about our building the hospitals. Many of them are built by the sailors themselves. The one in this city is built out of the deductions made from the pay of the sailors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Out of the hospital fund?

Mr. HOWE. I am not going to occupy any more time than is necessary to say, in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, that if he supposes I am trying to take away any support from the disabled or sick sailors he is entirely mistaken. The point I make, and to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senate, is simply this: that the fact that we have some sick sailors to take care of is no reason why we should put the whole civil fraternity, men, women, and children, under pay. They are not sick sailors. Whatever is necessary to take care of the disabled sailors ought to be and will be provided freely and abundantly at all times.

These are appropriations not to support these sailors there, but to support two or three thousand other men and women who never were seamen at all. The Senator from New Hampshire says that there is a large number at Chelsea hospital of chronic cases, and he estimates the number at one hundred. If he will look at the report which is right before him he will see that on two different days, of which we have authentic accounts, there was not half that number in that hospital.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I simply wish to mention the fact that the appropriation for this purpose last year was $60,763.

The amendment was concurred in.

The Secretary read the next excepted amendment, which was in line five of section two, to strike out "eight" and insert "seven."

Mr. DRAKE. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to delay the action of the Senate upon this bill, except to say one or two things upon this proposition. I did not suppose that the Senate would agree to the proposition of the Senator from New York, and was very much surprised at the vote. This question has been considered somewhat in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I know that there is not before that committee such information as justifies so large a reduction. Now I ask Senators upon what information they have reduced the Navy in its force to seventy-five hundred? Upon what information has this reduction been made? There is none from the Department upon which we can rely; and I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say that his committee had no information that would enable them to act with such certainty upon the subject as ought to prevail.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, through its chairman, has agreed and is willing to consent to a reduction to eighty-five hundred; and I must say that that reduction was agreed to by the chairman without very full information communicated to the rest of the committee; but upon a question of that sort I was willing to accept of the judgment of the chairman. We all know that he is well informed in regard to the Navy, its wants, its force, what is expected of it; therefore, when he has investigated a subject which I have not investigated in regard to the Navy, I am willing very much to rely upon his judgment. But I repeat the question: upon what information has the Senate agreed to reduce the force in the Navy a thousand almost less than was found necessary for years before the war? I ask Senators, in giving this vote, how many ships have we? What is their character? Upon what service are they expected to be employed? What number of men is required upon any one ship? Is there a Senator here who has voted to reduce this force to seventy-five hundred who can tell the Senate what force is necessary upon a single ship in the service? Where are those ships to be employed? What portion are to remain in port and what are to be upon the sea? Senators are not informed upon a question of that sort. We need very much information from the Department, and I thought it was going a great way when the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs proposed at one step to cut down from the war standard to the peace standard of the Navy.

But that seems not satisfactory to the Senator from New York, but we must go still a thousand below that. I know he includes the apprentices; but they are not regarded as a portion of the force that is to take charge of and manage the ships. We have come one thousand below that which was found necessary from 1857 to the commencement of the war, instead of eighty-five hundred seventy-five hundred. Now, I ask Senators upon what information have they given this vote? I believe there is not a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs who has advocated it. They have given the subject some attention; but without the opinion of a single member of that committee—a committee that ought to investigate the question as to the force necessary in the Navy—you reduce the Navy a thousand below what the chairman of the committee upon his observation and investigation says is necessary to keep the Navy in proper condition; and you do that when the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations tells you that he has no information to guide him. Are Senators willing in regard to the Navy to vote to fix the force necessary to maintain it, without any information, at a thousand less than the chairman says is necessary, a thousand less than was in the force prior to the war?

I do not, Mr. President, profess to say myself what the force ought to be, but I do not think the opinion of the Senator from New York ought to prevail altogether upon this question. I defer very much to his judgment, but not quite enough to say that the Committee on Naval Affairs ought to be disbanded in the Senate. If Senators believe that the Committee on Naval Affairs is of no importance in this body, then you had better disband it, wipe it from among the regular committees of the body. If there is any one question upon which the Senate ought to have the judgment of the Naval Committee it is certainly the question as to the force necessary to leave the Navy in a proper condition. Against the judgment of every member of that committee you have voted to reduce it below the standard that prevailed prior to the war.

Do Senators legislate thus upon other questions and in reference to other portions of the service? If it was proposed arbitrarily to reduce any part of the public service, would you do that without any information from the Department at all? Would you do it without some suggestion from the appropriate committee? Would you do it in the face of the judgment of the entire committee?

I do not understand, Mr. President, this vote. I cannot comprehend it. I have never seen an important action taken so entirely without information. It may be that we do not need half this force; I am not prepared to say; but I know the best guide is that we have before us. The Navy does need as large a force as it had before the war, from 1857 to 1861.

Prior to the commencement of the war it was found necessary to keep on our ships and in service eighty-five hundred men. I am not talking about powder-boys; I do not know what figure they cut in maintaining the honor and dignity of this nation prior to the war. I am speaking of the efficient force which was found necessary. Senators know that during the war we added very much to our naval force; we added to the vessels; we added to the Navy a class of vessels that requires a greater number of men to keep them in an efficient condition. We have added a class of vessels that require not only seamen but laborers in very large numbers. And, Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, having some regard for its position and its influence in this body, I am not willing to see the judgment of the committee upon an important question such as this, and upon which the judgment of the committee ought to have weight with this body, entirely ignored.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have often been surprised at the ingenuity exhibited by the Senator from Indiana, not to speak of other great qualities so conspicuous in him; but I never heard him address to this body a question which surprised me so much as that which he reiterates so often. Upon what information, he asks, has this Senate acted in reducing the number of effective men a thousand below the number found to be necessary before the war began. Why, sir, if I supposed he had been here, and had attended to this debate, I should be utterly confounded by his asking such a question as that and repeating it over and over again. Why? Because it is in the face of the incontestable fact of the case. During what year was it necessary to have a thousand men more than the Senate has voted in the Navy? During what day of what year was there a thousand men in the Navy, necessary or unnecessary, in addition to the number that we have fixed? During no year, at no time whatever. If the statement of the head of the bureau is to be relied upon, what is the fact? Why that only once in the history of the Navy, before the war, did it ever rise so high as seventy-six hundred men. I am not talking now either about powder-boys; I am talking about the effective force. There is where it was.

Now, then, with not more than two thirds the number of the vessels afloat, and with nothing like the number of guns, the Senate has fixed the number of men at the highest possible point within one hundred that experience ever showed to be necessary at any time; and then they have added twelve hundred and fifty apprentices and boys besides that; and the Senator rises here with very striking declamation to know why it is that the Senate has run off after a mere ignis fatuus in this way, and has undertaken to reduce the number of effective men below what experience has shown to be necessary. Now, Mr. President, let me answer the Senator categorically.

He wants to know upon what information we have done this thing. Let me tell him. The committee of the House and the House more than two weeks ago passed a bill which cut down the Navy two hundred and fifty below the point to which we have reduced it. Let me state why I say that. The House bill provided that the total force of the Navy, including apprentices and boys, should be only eighty-five hundred. That was the recommendation of the committee, and that was the vote of the House of Representatives two weeks ago. Now, sir, what do we find? The eyes of the Naval Department have been upon this bill; Senators have produced letters here, I know, about expected amendments. That Department knew what the House of Representatives had done; and has any Senator produced here a letter from the Navy Department showing that what the House had done was something inadmissible in the judgment of the Navy Department?

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. I am unwilling that the Navy Department should be put in a false position on this matter. They have not written to me on this subject, but I know it is against the wish of the Navy Department that the Navy should be reduced below twelve thousand, as it is now. The reason they have not written to me is that this section which passed the House of Representatives upon the naval appropriation bill was originally drawn by me and incorporated into a bill that I introduced into the Senate and had referred to the committee, and I supposed that the Department and myself were antagonists on the subject. I wanted to get the Navy back to where it was before the war. They thought it was not advisable to put it back. I thought that was just as far as it was safe to the public interest to reduce it, and I did not want to go below it, but I wanted to cut it down. Therefore, it must not be inferred, because the Secretary of the Navy has not written to anybody here in opposition to the reduction of the Navy, that the Department are not opposed to it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have no objection to that interruption, or rather that argument. Very likely it will assist the view which the Senator espouses. Now, I put to the sense of this Senate again the question which I suggested: why have we not heard from the Navy Department on this question? The Navy Department and bureaus of the Navy Department have written letters here; I do not speak of letters to the Senator from Iowa alone, but letters to other Senators, touching this bill. Several communications that I have presented here have been addressed to me on this very point. The Department knowing what was under consideration, being asked to ransack their records to enable us to determine this subject, have sent us letter after letter, but none on this question; no man here has been armed with an argument to show that when we have a reduced force, not only of guns afloat, but of vessels afloat, more men are necessary than anybody ever dreamed were necessary before.

The Senator from Iowa cannot answer this suggestion by saying that the Navy Department did not address him for the reason that they wish to hold the force up to the present number, which he persists in saying is over twelve thousand, which is made up only by counting apprentices and boys. I repeat, the force is only eleven thousand and a fraction without them. He does not answer it by that suggestion; but it is left in this way: that the House of Representatives, intending to reduce the Navy to where it was before the war, sent us a maximum of eighty-five hundred, and we turn around in the first place and change the word "including" to "excluding," and thus add all the number of boys and apprentices now in the service, namely, nine hundred and sixteen, and then we raise that number to twelve hundred and fifty, and put that on, and then we reduce the rank and file one thousand from the House provision; and thus we increase over their vote two hundred and fifty, and make an amount largely in excess of what the Navy ever was for an hour before the war began. We, who are all the time declaiming and subjecting ourselves, some of us, to criticism, because we do declaim in favor of retrenchment and frugality, do this; and now, without any argument under heaven, the Senate is asked to turn around and do what? To add twelve hundred and fifty to the number of the Navy as it was before the war; and why? Because steam has come into requisition more than it used to do; and that, although we know the number of vessels afloat has been largely reduced and the number of guns has been largely reduced. But upon that argument, without anybody having a word to add to it, we are to reverse the action of the House committee and the judgment of the House which has gone unchallenged by the Navy Department up to this moment.

Mr. GRIMES. Allow me to ask him a question. Does the Senator understand that coal-heavers and firemen were included in the eighty-five hundred before the war?

Mr. CONKLING. I understand that in answer to a letter calling for men of all sorts and conditions rated in the Navy before the war I am furnished with a table showing that seventy-six hundred is the highest possible mark that that number ever touched.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand the Senator to say that that includes coal-heavers and firemen?

Mr. CONKLING. I say that that is an answer to a letter asking for all the men of all sorts and conditions in the Navy before the war, and the answer does include every one excepting the powder-boys, and the answer as to those is that the information could only be given in the office of the Fourth Auditor, and on going there I found it could only be given at the office of the Second Auditor, and it could not be obtained there without an amount of labor I could not ask to have bestowed.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform the Senate what was the number of coal-heavers and firemen in the service before the war?

Mr. CONKLING. I have informed the Senate that the men are given altogether, the officers by themselves, and all others by themselves; and he understands, of course, in asking this question, that I cannot specify the number of coal-heavers or the number of any other denomination of men in the Navy. I am talking about totals and aggregates, and that I supposed we were all talking about, except when Senators keep talking about this imaginary number of eighty-five hundred that never existed except in possibilities which were not resorted to or reached.

Mr. President, I want to make one other remark in answer to the Senator from Indiana. He put this as if in some way or other it was the action of the Senate in contrariety of the views and judgment of the Naval Committee, audacious almost in that respect! I know it is not parliamentary to allude to what happens in committees, but without trenching upon any rule I may say, because I made the statement myself repeatedly the other day, and no one is to blame, for it more than I am, if there be blame in the case, that the Appropriation Committee, of which the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is a member, proceeded upon the idea that anterior to the war eighty-five hundred was not the number they might have had in the Navy if they needed them, but the number which in point of fact they did have.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say to the Senator that he is wholly mistaken so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I can only say that the Senator was misunderstood; I will speak for nobody else besides myself; but certainly I shall give no offense by saying that he led me two or three times in this Chamber to inform other Senators, not merely in conversation, but publicly in debate, that the number of men actually in the Navy anterior to the war was eighty-five hundred, and I took my information from what he said. Of course, however, I admit that I misunderstood him if he says he did not intend to be so understood.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator did certainly misunderstand me, for I never stated so, and I think the Senator from Maine will bear me testimony that I never said so in committee. I said that the amount fixed by law was eighty-five hundred, but I did not know how many there were actually in service or had ever been.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will require nothing more of me than the remark I have made about that, I am sure, because I say I take it for granted that the error was with me, although I was misled, and I transferred my mistake to the Senate and here stated it in debate. I am very glad to be put right about it, because I wish to be accurate, certainly, in any statement that I make. However, sir, the point which I was going to submit is not answered at all by the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa. It was understood here the other day when the Senate voted—of this there can be no mistake, because every Senator present will bear me out in it—that we were putting back, by the vote first given the other day, the Navy to where it was in truth, not in imagination, anterior to the war. Now, it turns out that we were not doing any such thing; it turns out that while the law gave the Department the power before the war to increase the Navy to eighty-five hundred, they never in any case had need to approach that maximum, but that the highest number they ever had was seventy-six hundred; and that, too, as I do not wish to repeat too often, with a much greater number of vessels and a much greater number of guns.

The other day the committee and the Senate were entirely agreed that the principle upon which we should act was to restore the Navy to its former condition in fact. We are only doing that now; we are only correcting the vote given the other day by the official figures which are presented to us. Is not that right? It seems to me manifestly it is, particularly when two facts are borne in mind; one is, that the question now before us is practically not who shall be enlisted into the Navy, but how many shall be mustered out of the Navy to raise it to a given point; and the other fact is this, which must not be forgotten: we are discussing here a question of debtor and credit between the Treasury of the United States and the Navy of the United States. Senators must not forget that the pay has been raised during the war, and that, therefore, the same establishment which we had before will be vastly more expensive than it was; and when that is taken into the account, and when we include the fact that we had added two hundred and fifty to the number the House fixed and thus two hundred and fifty to the actual number of men that there ever was when the number was highest before the war, I think the Senate will be able to defend itself and excuse itself against the criticism made by my honorable friend from Indiana.

Everybody knows that, excepting the interest upon the public debt, the two bulky items of appropriation are the Army and the Navy; and consistency in retrenchment certainly will hold every Senator and every Representative to scrutinize those two items of appropriation. The interest is fixed; we cannot cut that down; but those other two great items are not fixed; they are the proper subject of adjustment. Now, here is the opportunity to follow the committee of the House of Representatives and the original intentions of the committees of this body, and at the same time to leave the country furnished with the whole complement and equipment that it ever had, and something added to that. If we cannot stand by that, sir, I humbly submit it is idle for any of us to talk about or to hope for retrenchment or diminution in any way the appropriations that we make.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I think I am as earnestly in favor of retrenchment and reform as the Senator from New York; but I propose to have some guides to my judgment when I strike. When you reduced the Army, or when you made a legal establishment of the Army last year, did you do it without any investigation? Did you not consult the War Department? Did you not take the judgment of the distinguished Committee on Military Affairs of this body? And when you fixed it did you reduce it to the peace establishment? When you made it eighty regiments strong, did you not take the judgment of the War Department and also of the committee upon that subject? Now, when you propose to reduce the Navy four or five thousand, at least one third, are you not willing to take somewhat the judgment of the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the question? The question itself is never to reach that committee, it seems; but simply a general declamation in favor of retrenchment, economy, and reform, you are to cut down below the standard of peace prior to the war. I did not state the question at all improperly when I was up before. The legal standard before the war was eighty-five hundred; and the Senator thinks he answers by saying the standard was not reached, the corps was not full; it was only filled up to seventy-six hundred at its maximum practically and in fact. Sir, are we not now fixing the legal standard of the force? We are not now putting the men in, but we are saying what shall be the maximum, fixing it according to law.

When last year you said that the Army might be seventy five or eighty regiments, you contemplated what is now the case; that it is only fifty-six thousand men strong. And when you now fix the legal maximum of the Navy at eighty-five hundred, it does not involve the necessity that it should always be thus full. There may be times when the Department will let it run down to seventy-six hundred, or below that. All we ask is that the standard prior to the war shall have some force in the Senate, and that the judgment of the committee shall have some respect in this body.

Now, sir, the Senator refers again to the apprentices. I want to know if apprentices are to be regarded as a portion of the available force of the Navy. What is the apprentice? A boy that is placed in the service for the purpose of learning him how to be of service. The apprentice is not to be regarded as a part of the available strength of the service.

The Senator, in answer to my inquiry what information has the Senate, tells us—what? I challenged for the information, and he tells us that two weeks ago the other House passed this bill reducing the Navy to eighty-five hundred men, including the apprentices. Our committee reports eighty-five hundred men excluding the apprentices. In other words, the committee places the standard where it was before the war, and does not regard the apprentices, boys that are learning how to be of service to the nation, as a part of the naval force. But is the Senate to be told when we ask for information that the House has passed the bill? If that is to be regarded, Senators, as a sufficient answer, why do we investigate any question that comes from the House? Why not say that the House is the people's branch, and that the Senate must concur in every judgment of the House? That is not the policy of American legislation. The Senate for itself decides what shall be the Army and the Navy of the United States as well as the House of Representatives exercises its judgment upon the subject; and in the absence of information it is but reasonable to follow the Committee on Naval Affairs when it says to the Senate that we ought not to go below the legal standard—I do not mean the number in fact, but the standard fixed by law prior to the war.

The Senator has referred to the expense to the nation of the Army and Navy, and says that we must strike down. Why, sir, we agree to strike down nearly one third, from twelve thousand and some hundred to eighty-five hundred. I understand this apprentice business. That is not a part of the naval force. That is the source from which we expect to fill up the Navy from time to time, to furnish it with experienced and educated men for its purposes. It is not to be regarded as a part of its available force for keeping ships in trim, managing them in their cruises, and doing all those things for which we need a force.

I concede the importance of the retrenchment in the Army and where we can in the Navy. When we agree to reduce the Navy from twelve thousand three hundred, as I believe it now stands, to eighty-five hundred, is not that a large retrenchment? Is the Senator from New York prepared to say that the Navy ought to be retrenched to a greater extent? That you should reduce it more than a third? I do not know that. Before I vote upon that subject I wish to have the opinion of the Committee on Naval Affairs; I wish to have the opinion of the Department, and all the facts stated. I want to know, when we reduce the Army, where our regiments are, how full they are, what number of regiments were required upon the border, what number of regiments to man our forts, where we need a military force; and then, having all the facts, I am prepared to vote with some degree of intelligence upon the proposed reduction of the Army. What is the comparison, sir? The Army is costing us $100,000,000 a year. Last month, as I noticed by some statement in the newspapers, it cost cost nearly fourteen million dollars, or at the rate of over one hundred and fifty million dollars a year.

I do not choose that the comparison shall be made between the Navy and the Army in that respect. But it is not a part of my argument now to institute any comparison. The Senator has spoken of the two. There is no comparison. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is willing to reduce the Navy down to the standard prior to the war. Does the Senator from New York wish to go further in regard to the Army? Prior to the war the Army, as fixed by law, was about sixteen thousand men. When some committee shall propose to reduce the Army to the peace standard of sixteen thousand men will the Senator from New York get up then and in the name of economy, retrenchment, and reform say that we must go a thousand lower? No, sir. We must know something about it, in my judgment, before we reduce below the peace standard.

And his comparison of the number of guns prior to the war and at this time, I think, throws no light on the question. The Senator knows very well that upon some of the vessels there are but two guns, when on some of the old-fashioned ships, requiring no more men, there might be a dozen or perhaps twenty or thirty guns; so that throws no light upon the subject. We must have the men to manage the ships according to their machinery and their mode of being managed.

Now, sir, all I have to add is just this—the argument I commenced with: it is now proposed to reduce the Navy to the legal standard of eighty-five hundred, where it was before the war; and I say that the Senate is not justified in going below that unless we have some information from the Department or some report from the proper committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 15; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Montana Agricultural, Mechanical, and Mineral Association, praying a donation of public lands to that Territory for the benefit of the association; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSAY presented a petition of Mrs. Emma M. Moore, widow of Lieutenant John W. Cox, of the United States Navy, and of the late senior Captain E. W. Moore, of the Texas navy, praying to be restored to the pension list; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I present to the Senate a memorial from some two or three thousand colored citizens of the South, living in South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi, asking the Government of the United States to give them some aid to enable them to emigrate to Liberia. It is stated in a paper from the Colonization Society accompanying the memorial that the society have applications from three thousand for passage to Liberia, and that the memorial which I am about to present is authorized to be signed by four thousand more, making a total of seven thousand. Their representation is that they are unable to obtain the happiness to which every man is entitled in the condition in which they now are; that the rewards of their labor are barely sufficient to enable them to live; that they have no means of educating their children; and that the social inequality which would seem to be inseparable from their condition is such that they can never hope to be anything else than inferiors in the estimation of the white race. They desire, therefore, to go to Liberia, where there is a republic, consisting of members of their own race, firmly established, recognized as a Government by nearly all the nations of the world, and now in a career of prosperity. I have reason to believe that so far as they speak of that Government the facts justify their statements. They have their schools and colleges which, in point of usefulness, in point of science, compare well with the best of those to be found within the United States; and many of their State papers which have fallen under my own eye compare also very well with the best of the State papers which have emanated from the Government of the United States. It is but natural that they should desire to be incorporated into a government of that description, consisting of persons of the same race with themselves, and it would have been much better, I think, for the Government of the United States in every respect, if it could have been accomplished, that the emigration of these persons should have been provided for years ago; and by this time, by a comparatively small appropriation, they might all have been on the African shore, the land of their fathers, and there contribute, and effectually contribute, to the civilization of a country as fertile as any country in the world, and thus to compensate as much as possible for the rapine, the robbery by which their ancestors were brought to the United States. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that petitions like the one of which I have just spoken have been referred to the Committee on Finance; and with the permission of the Chair, therefore, I move the reference of the memorial that I presented to that committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think you had better let it stand as it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. They should all go to one committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs and representatives of Miss Harriet Pinkney, deceased, praying the restoration to them of Pinkney Island, South Carolina, the same having been confiscated, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles E. Capehart, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 478) for the relief of Charles E. Capehart. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Daniel Ellis, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 474) for the relief of Captain Daniel Ellis. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) donating certain captured ordnance for the completion of a monument to the memory of the late Major General John Sedgwick, reported it without amendment.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of Eliza Mascher, widow of John F. Mascher, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 349) granting aid in the construction of a railroad from the town of Vallejo to Humboldt bay, in the State of California, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, reported it with amendments.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HOWE. There are quite a number of bills pending before the Senate reported from the Committee on Claims, and I am disposed to ask the Senate either to allow me this afternoon or to-morrow afternoon, or an evening, this evening or to-morrow evening, as the Senate shall prefer, to consider those private bills. Many of them are bills the passage of which is very important to the parties interested. The press of public business has been such as to crowd them out from the consideration of the Senate up to this time, and, unless the Senate concede what I ask, it seems probable that they will be crowded out of consideration for a long while to come. I hardly know whether to submit a motion for an afternoon or an evening; but I am very anxious that the Senate should accord me one or the other. I will be content with either, whichever will best accommodate the Senate. I suggest to-morrow afternoon, with a view of getting at the sense of the Senate, and I therefore move that to-morrow, at one o'clock, be assigned for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. To-morrow I shall want to pass an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that to-morrow at one o'clock be assigned for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to report a deficiency bill to-day which we ought to pass, and, perhaps, we can pass it this morning. Otherwise, I shall be obliged to ask for the consideration of that bill at the earliest moment. It is a very small affair, containing only two items. It would not occupy much time anywhere. With the understanding that I should have an opportunity to dispose of that bill I do not know that I should object to the Senator's motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As many as are in favor of the motion—

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To dedicate to-morrow after one o'clock to the consideration of private bills reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand the motion to be confined to bills from the Committee on Claims; but if so, I shall vote against it. I understand that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is that the day shall be given to private bills.

Mr. HOWE. Bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I shall vote against it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that this motion will not be adopted by the Senate. There is a bill before the Senate which I am very anxious to get up again for consideration, and to have the Senate come to final action upon; and that is the bill relating to the Central Branch Pacific railroad, which has been up for consideration several times. I am very anxious, the moment an opportunity shall present itself, to call it up again and take the final vote upon it. I shall therefore move it at the first opportunity, though I do not foresee that I shall be able to do so to-day on account of the protracted debate upon the naval appropriation bill; but I hope no hour will be fixed for the consideration of any other bill until that shall be disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my friend whether he expects that the naval appropriation bill will occupy all day?

Mr. HOWARD. Judging from the past, I should think it very likely that it might.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that we shall be able to pass both bills to-day.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator is not more ardent in that hope than I am, surely; but judging from the past I foresee that the most of this day may be spent in the discussion of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it is in order, I will move that to-morrow night at half past seven o'clock be assigned instead of to-morrow afternoon at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The preceding motion is that to-morrow after one o'clock be appropriated to the consideration of the bills mentioned.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest that it is hardly worth while to make a special order in regard to these bills. The Senator can give notice that he intends to move to proceed to the consideration of those bills at that time, and I presume there will be no difficulty about it; but making a special assignment by a vote would be objectionable, although I think the Senate would concede a willingness to proceed with the consideration of private bills without a vote.

Mr. CONNESS. What do I understand the form of the motion to be now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is, that to-morrow after one o'clock be devoted to the consideration of private bills reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE. "And the Committee on Pensions," I ought to have added.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be modified in that way—the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall vote against that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Was not my motion to amend in order? I moved to amend by substituting half past seven o'clock in the evening, instead of one o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN and others. Oh, no; do not have an evening session.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better have an evening session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, I withdraw.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend by striking out the two committees. I think private claims that come from other committees ought to have a chance also. I know one private bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, only one, and I do not see why it is not entitled to the same consideration as others. I move, therefore, to amend the motion by striking out the two committees, so as to have it simply a resolution that to-morrow shall be devoted to private claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin accept that modification?

Mr. HOWE. I cannot.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on amending the motion by striking out the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Pensions, so that the motion shall be simply to devote to-morrow to the consideration of private bills.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that to-morrow after the morning hour be devoted to the consideration of private bills from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to; ayes twenty-eight, noes not counted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 266. It is a bill that has been read, and that will, I think, lead to no discussion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That bill will lead to discussion. I shall discuss it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, then, let us discuss it now. It is a very important bill to the commerce of the Northwest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to take up the bill (S. No. 266) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that bill will not be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The morning business is not through yet.

Mr. CHANDLER. The morning business is through, I think.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a bill to which the Treasury Department is very much opposed. I have letters and statements from them which I must submit to the Senate. It is a bill that makes a very important change in the revenue laws, and, in my judgment, it ought not to pass in its present shape. Perhaps something ought to be done; but in the half hour that is now left between this time and the time when the special order will come up it will be impossible to pass this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall ask, then, that it be continued until it is passed. It is, perhaps, one of the most important bills to the commerce of the Northwest that have been presented here in a long time, and I do not think it will lead to much discussion. I shall be very happy to hear anything the Senator from Maine may have to say in opposition to it. Although the clerk in the Treasury Department who writes opinions for that Department is not very much in its favor, I have found upon examination of him that he knew nothing about it. The Committee on Commerce was unanimous, after a thorough investigation of several weeks, in recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be so; but I have understood from one member of the Committee on Commerce that he did not know anything about it.

Mr. CHANDLER. All who were present when it was considered were in favor of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think, from the character of the bill, it could not have been much considered. It changes entirely the whole system of trade upon the lakes. It affects the revenue very much, and decreases the revenue considerably, and makes an entirely different system from that which prevails in other parts of the country. Whether Congress is prepared to adopt it or not I do not know. I knew nothing about it at the time the bill was first presented here, but I have taken pains to inquire since. I inquired of the honorable Senator when he presented it if it had been submitted to the Treasury Department, and he said it had been; but he did not inform the Senate in his reply that the Treasury Department was very much opposed to it, and had written to him a letter disapproving of it, which I have since ascertained to be the fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should have stated it if the Senator had asked me the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did ask the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator asked if it had been submitted to the Department, and I said it had been.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But it was not stated that their opinion was unfavorable.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know it was so; but still I must insist on the passage of the bill. I hold in my hand a communication signed by most of the shippers of the Northwest recommending it. It has been very thoroughly examined, and I know of no opposition to it except from a few custom-house officers, who think their fees may be reduced, and the Senator from Maine. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Maine that his objections are not well taken; and as for the custom-house officers, if the commerce of the country is to be hampered for their benefit, it may as well be known now as at any future time. It will not materially affect their fees generally, but in some cases it will cut them off. It is really a bill of very great interest to the shipping interests of the Northwest. The ships are now coming out; navigation will be open within a week or ten days, and they are very anxious that this bill shall be passed now, so that they may begin the season under it. It is a subject with which I am perfectly familiar, and I shall be very happy to give the Senator any information he may desire. I ask that the bill be taken up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce, but I had the impression that the fees received were paid into the public Treasury, and did not go to the custom-house officers; that they are paid by a salary.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; but the collector has a contingent interest in the fees up to the limit of his salary. The salaries of some of these officers, for example, are fixed at $1,000 a year, and they have a contingent interest in the fees up to $2,500, and after that they have no interest. Some of those collectors are afraid that if this bill be passed their contingent interest may not reach the full amount they are entitled by law to receive. I do not think it will affect more than one or two in that way, and then all that is cut off will be from a few steamboats that now pay enormously.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator assumes that the opposition comes from the custom-house officers. I have not heard of that. The opposition I referred to is the opinion of the officers of the Treasury Department with reference to the effect on the revenue. I do not know that there are any remonstrances here against it; I have not heard of any.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have seen some from the Treasury that came from custom-house officers. The whole opposition at the Treasury comes from custom-house officers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The custom-house officers undoubtedly in this case, as in all such cases, are consulted as to the operation of the measure in their line; but that they have any pecuniary interest in the matter I am not aware.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will inform the Senator that the committee have taken the opinion of several custom-house officers and custom-house agents as to the effect of the bill; and all, with two or three exceptions, where they are afraid their fees will be cut off, are in favor of it. I hope the bill will be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to take up the bill named by him.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was not aware that we had yet gone through with the morning business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I supposed we had.

Mr. ANTHONY. If so, I have no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are in order.

DISTRICT REGISTER OF DEEDS.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 453) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish the office of register of deeds for the District of Columbia," approved February 14, 1863, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask that it be taken up now for consideration. There is a vacancy in the office, occasioned by the death of the incumbent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to take up the bill is not in order, under the present rules, until the morning business is through with.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask unanimous consent to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to hear it read before I know whether to object or not. If it merely provides for one register of deeds I shall not object; but if it is a general scheme I must ask that it be printed.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that the amendment reported by the committee be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to appoint a suitable person to act as register of deeds in said District whenever a vacancy may exist in said office, who shall perform the duties of register and receive the legal fees therefor until a register shall be appointed and qualified as now provided by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill must lie over.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted an amendment to be proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations under the rules.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the pension laws that the marriage of a deceased soldier's widow shall no longer work a forfeiture of her pension.

WASHINGTON CITY CHARTER.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia have instructed me to report a bill in relation to the extension of the charter of the city of Washington; and I think it ought to be taken up and acted on at once.

The bill (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask leave to make a statement in relation to this bill. The charter of the city will expire in May. The annual election will occur in June. The voters of the city have to be registered in advance of the annual election. It is somewhat important, therefore, that the charter be extended now, at least temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long do you propose to extend it?

Mr. HARLAN. One year. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to continue in force for one year from its passage the act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington, approved May 17, 1848, and the several amendments thereof now in force, or until Congress shall by law determine otherwise.

Mr. SUMNER. I have in my hands a bill which has already passed the House of Representatives, and which has been carefully considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, which was reported by myself by their direction some time ago. I have tried to bring it before the Senate separately, and it is very important that it should be acted on now. It may be treated as a supplement to the bill before the Senate. I unite with my friend from Iowa in expressing my sense of the importance of some action like that which he proposes, but it seems to me that it is not sufficient. There are some other details which we must regulate now in advance, if possible; the citizens of the District are very anxious that they should be attended to; and some of them are embodied in the bill which I hold in my hand. I now send it to the Chair, and move it as an amendment to the pending bill.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to the bill the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the mayor of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, the board of aldermen, and the board of common council thereof, to assemble in joint convention at the City Hall, in said city, on the first Tuesday of the first month after the passage of this act, and proceed to select by ballot all officers whose appointments, upon the nomination of the mayor, are now authorized by the charter, or by any law of the United States, or act or ordinance of said city, or which may hereafter be authorized thereby, who shall hold their offices, respectively, for one year, and until a successor is appointed; and on the same day of the month in each year thereafter the joint convention shall proceed to a new selection: Provided, That when so assembled they may abolish any of the offices now established not elective by the voters of the city, or change the duties connected therewith, or the compensation thereof, as they may deem proper or necessary for the interests of said city: And provided further, That no person shall be regarded as incompetent to hold any of said offices, or be disqualified therefor, who is a qualified elector in said District.

And be it further enacted, That in all the meetings of the mayor of the city of Washington and of the boards of aldermen and common council for the purposes mentioned in the first section of this act the mayor or the president of either of said boards shall preside, and the secretaries of said boards shall act as tellers, and keep a record of the proceedings, and the mayor or any member of either of said boards may nominate one or more persons for the offices required to be filled, and the person having the highest number of votes shall be publicly declared selected, and a certificate of his election shall within five days be made out and be signed by the presiding officer and secretaries, and be transmitted to the person selected, who shall within ten days thereafter enter on the discharge of the duties of his office, which shall be immediately vacated by any person then holding the same.

And be it further enacted, That all questions arising in the joint convention authorized by this act shall be determined by a majority of the votes of the members thereof present at any of its meetings, and it shall have power to adjourn from time to time until all the duties imposed upon it shall be completed, and to require of the persons selected for any office such security as may be deemed necessary. And in the event of any vacancy from disability, death, or resignation, it shall be the duty of the mayor to call a meeting of the joint convention to select a successor for the unexpired term of service.

And be it further enacted, That when the mayor, board of aldermen, and common council shall be assembled in joint convention as provided for in this act, they shall by a majority vote designate a bank in which the various moneys of the city of Washington shall be deposited, and they shall make such regulations in relation to the mode in which such funds shall be kept and paid out as shall be deemed advisable for the interests of the city; and within five days after such designation a certificate of the bank selected shall be made out and placed in the hands of the president or cashier thereof, and thereafter it shall not be lawful to retain or deposit the funds of the city, or any part thereof, in any other bank or place.

And be it further enacted, That all acts and ordinances or parts thereof, or parts of the charter of the city of Washington, inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not propose to proceed blindfold about anything. I should like to know, in the first place, whether this proposition has been considered by a committee?

Mr. SUMNER. Most carefully considered in the Committee on the District of Columbia. It has already passed the House of Representatives, and has been on the Calendar of the Senate now for some time; but the Senator knows very well, in the press of public business, the difficulty of bringing forward the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose there was no harm in asking for information.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was all I proposed to do.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has just been read through.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the honorable member can explain it.

Mr. SUMNER. The amendment is explained by a resolution which passed the common council of the city of Washington, which I will read. It will be an answer to the question of the Senator:

"Mr. S. S. Baker offered a resolution urging the immediate passage by Congress of the act pending in the Senate making all officers now appointed by the mayor elective by joint meeting of the boards."

Mr. O. S. Baker objected, stating that the Conservatives had one majority on joint ballot.

Mr. Plau offered an amendment so as to ask authority for the joint boards to designate the bank of deposit; which was accepted.

"The resolution was adopted."

The object of the amendment is to take from the mayor the existing authority to appoint certain officers and to lodge it with the boards, the mayor presiding on those occasions. It is also to take from the mayor the power which he now has of selecting the bank of deposit. It is well known that the appointing power, as exercised by the mayor, has been hostile to those citizens who now constitute a majority of the population, especially hostile to all colored persons. No colored person can be appointed through the mayor. If this bill passes colored persons may hope for some appointments through the boards. In that matter I hope I shall have the sympathy of my friend, the Senator from Maryland. I know he would not throw himself in the path of colored persons deserving appointments from the city government. I think that he will join us in supporting this measure.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not mean to throw myself in the path of anybody seeking office; but, although I have the kindest possible feeling for "our colored brethren," in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, yet if I was the mayor I should not appoint any of them to any office of any consequence. They now hold under the administration of all the Departments here a great many of the subordinate offices, and I believe there are some of them in the mayor's office. A great many of the messengers belonging to the several Departments and bureaus have been men of color. They discharge their duties, I have no doubt, very well; but to place them in office under the city government, and without limiting the kind of offices they are to fill, might be productive of very serious mischief to the citizens. They are, the most of them, wholly uneducated. The most of those who are in the city, a large majority of them, have become residents of the city during the war. They are really in one sense not citizens to be relied upon, because they have no interest in the city which is a guarantee that they could be safely intrusted with the management of the finances or other measures necessary to conduct the city government with propriety. I do not know, Mr. President—and I am left to understand from the honorable member from Massachusetts that that is the fact—that any actual inconvenience has resulted from the power of appointment being in the mayor, unless it be (if that be an inconvenience) that as long as he is the mayor he will not nominate to any important office any of these colored gentlemen or colored ladies.

The honorable member from Massachusetts has had an opportunity of showing that he is willing to give them the same attention as he is to give to the white race; but I do not believe that he has given any of his tickets to any of them to come to the court of impeachment. Why not? Because there is a difference; because it would be distasteful to a great many of those who agree in political opinion with the honorable member from Massachusetts. We have had the tickets issued now for some time, seven or eight or ten days, and I believe not more than six or seven colored persons have been seen in the gallery. It is one thing: Mr. President, (and every man who considers for a moment will agree in that opinion, I think,) it is one thing to give to them all the rights of citizenship, to place them upon an equality politically with all the white race, and another thing to enable them to be placed in a situation, through some political contrivance, some party measure, to get possession of the offices of the Government. If I thought that their safety depended upon it, that the protection of their rights as men depended upon it, nobody would be more willing to place them in the situation which the honorable member from Massachusetts desires them to fill than I; but I am yet to learn that it is important to the enjoyment of all the rights which belong to us that we should hold office. That is a matter of political expediency to be governed from time to time by the circumstances existing from time to time in every political community; and if there be a prejudice or an unwillingness that a measure of this sort should be adopted, that of itself, looking to the quiet and peace of the community, is sufficient reason with me for not giving them that which it is not material they should have in order to the protection of all the rights which belong to them as mere men.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I would simply observe to the Senator from Maryland that this amendment, proposed by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, does not require the appointment of colored people to fill any of the offices. It changes somewhat the appointing power, however; it confers it on the mayor and aldermen and councilmen when convened in joint convention for that purpose. Those gentlemen are all white men, and the presumption is that they are intelligent men, and will not select either white or black men for any of these minor offices who are not competent to fill them. I would observe also that, if this amendment should be adopted and the bill pass with the amendment, it would place this power precisely where I think it is placed in Baltimore. I am sure it is so in Georgetown, and I think it is so in all the great cities of the country. The aldermen and the councilmen with the mayor of the cities appoint to those minor places. This is the whole of it.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the question. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest that they be called upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. No; I want them on the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. DAVIS. On that question I want to say a word. The proposition to give a negro authority over white men cannot come up here in any form under God's heavens that I will not oppose it. The idea of placing negroes in this District over white men, giving them the rule under the city government or any other government, is a proposition that I will never give any sanction to while I have a seat here. If there is any absurd dogma, if there is any preposterous proposition on this earth that I am opposed to, it is generally, universally, an equality between the races. It does not exist in nature; it has been disproved by the history of both races from the beginning of time to the present hour, and it will be so from the present hour to the end of time. A race that has never done anything whatever to emerge from barbarism, that has never contributed one iota to the civilization and progress of men generally, to be placed in this country over the white man is a proposition too monstrous and absurd, in my judgment, to receive the sanction of any reasonable and unprejudiced people. If you were now to put the negroes of St. Domingo to themselves exclusively what would be the result? They commenced the career of self-government nearly a century ago; about one third of them were mulattoes, and had considerable education; but they have been degenerating from that time to the present, and revolutions in their government are almost as frequent as the changes of the moon. If it was not for the number of white people who are resident among them, and from their intercourse with whites in commerce and in trade, they would have fallen into their original barbarism years since.

The negro race began the career of history, I may say, with the white man; but the negro race in the interior of Africa, numbering seventy millions, are in the same state of fossil barbarism that they were four thousand years ago. They have never invented letters; have no arts, no sciences, no civilization, but are as fixed in their ignorance and barbarism as though they were fossils under the face of the earth. To make the descendants of such a race as that, which is wholly incapable of civilization, the equals of the white man, among a people that have the decision of that proposition, is the greatest injustice to the white race that could possibly be attempted. Sir, we are admonished on this subject from day to day. Go to Michigan, one of the States that it was supposed was most deeply committed to negro suffrage, and how have the white people decided that question in the election of yesterday? The question will, sooner or later, sweep every party and every man who advocates it in this country from political life. If the question was put seriously, in the bosom of the family, to every white man of ordinary intelligence in the land, "Are you willing to recognize the negro as your equal politically, socially, in all the relations of life," nine tenths of the white population would answer in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I am glad of it; and I wish this measure would go over eternally. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the special order be postponed for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope so, by general consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the special order be postponed for the purpose of continuing the debate on this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say that the naval appropriation bill only requires a single vote to finish it.

Mr. SUMNER. Still, I would suggest to my friend, as this bill is now before the Senate, that we proceed with it to the end. It cannot take long.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not like to have the other bill displaced. This motion would displace that bill.

Mr. NYE. Let us suspend it temporarily.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not the slightest objection to laying it aside informally.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let it be done so. I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should not like to have my bill displaced, because it is nearly finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Evidently the unfinished business cannot be laid aside informally, because the yeas and nays are called on the motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The call can be withdrawn. I do not like to have my bill put aside, because I think we can take a vote in five minutes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not suppose the appropriation bill for the support of the American Navy is of any consequence when it comes in comparison with a measure of this sort, which shall secure the appointment of colored people to hold offices in the capital of the nation instead of white people. That is the reform I believe that is to be accomplished, and of course an appropriation to support the Navy ought to stand aside until that is done.

Mr. HARLAN. I have this remark only to make. I suppose the Senator from Indiana knows that now by law no colored man can hold office in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not prepared to say that. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who is better versed on a question of that sort than I pretend to be, claims that the bill which was passed and which failed to receive the signature of the President in November last, and I believe also in July last, is the law. I would like to have his opinion upon that particular point, whether he considers that to be the law. That bill, which failed to receive the signature of the President because of the recess of Congress, or rather which failed to be returned to Congress by the President because of the recess, I understand the Senator from Massachusetts claims now to be a law. That bill did give to negroes the right to hold office as well as white people.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I understand the opposition of the Senator to this bill to be that the law already provides that they may hold office, which he is in favor of.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, Mr. President, the Senator from California is too shrewd a man to understand me so. He understands me as opposing this bill, the purpose of which is to take the appointment of officers from the mayor, according to the ancient usage of the District, and to give it to a body who will certainly confer offices on negroes instead of white men. That is what I object to.

Mr. SUMNER. It gives some offices to the white people and some to the colored people; it gives them justice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to give the white men something of a chance in this country.

Mr. SUMNER. They will have a good chance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would yield to the desire of the Senator from Iowa, who has charge of this bill, but I am satisfied from what I see about me that the bill will exhaust the afternoon.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no; it cannot.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And there is but one single question to conclude on the naval appropriation bill, which has been now twice or thrice before the Senate. I think we shall make dispatch by allowing the vote to be taken on the naval appropriation bill, and then proceeding to the consideration of this subject. I hope, therefore, the Senate will allow me to conclude the appropriation bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill reported by the Senator from Iowa this morning from the Committee on the District of Columbia is a measure of some importance, and it ought to be passed. The charter of this city will expire in the course of a very short time, and this proposition is a simple one. It is to continue in operation the present charter until the Committee on the District of Columbia shall have duly considered another act for the purpose of organizing the city authorities here. The probability is that before we get through with the impeachment proceedings the charter will have expired, and, there being no government left, we shall be rather in a bad fix in the city. It expires in May; I believe on the 20th of May. I will ask the chairman if that is not so?

Mr. HARLAN. From the 15th to the 17th.

Mr. HENDERSON. The 15th or 17th of May, which is only little over a month from to-day. The probability is that after we shall commence the impeachment trial again on Thursday we shall not be able to take up any legislative business prior to that time. Such a thing, if not probable, is at least possible. The bill was unanimously reported by the committee this morning. I am very sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts has thought fit to encumber this simple measure with a proposition that excites debate. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his amendment, and let us consider that subject in the new charter. Otherwise, I fear, from the indications around me, that it will be impossible to pass this measure to-day, and it is important, if the House is to act upon it, that it should be put through here to-day.

I rose merely to state the importance of the measure proposed by the chairman of the committee, and to express my hope that the Senator from Massachusetts would withdraw his amendment. On the final vote on his amendment I should expect to vote for it with my views of these questions; but I hope he will see the necessity of the passage of the original bill to-day, and, with that view, will withdraw his amendment, so that the Senator who has charge of the naval appropriation bill will consent that that may be postponed for the time being, until a vote can be had on the original proposition of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. With my friend from Missouri I see the necessity of the passage of the bill reported by the chairman of the committee; but I see also the necessity of the passage of the amendment. The Senator is mistaken if he supposes that one has not the sanction of the committee as much as the other.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is true.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it is true. Of course it is true. It was some time ago that I reported from the committee, by their direction, the House bill No. 143, entitled "An act to regulate the selection of officers in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and for other purposes." I have tried to put that on its passage from day to day without succeeding in getting it before the Senate. Now, by the direction of the Committee on the District I move it as an amendment to the bill reported by the chairman of the committee this morning. I am acting as the organ of the committee now in making this motion. After a careful view of the whole ground they regarded the passage of this bill by way of amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa as important. And let me say, that after a careful consideration of the matter, having put myself in communication with various committees of our fellow-citizens here in the District, I am satisfied that this amendment of mine is of very great practical importance prior to any election that may take place. If it is not acted on to-day, I shall despair of its passage prior to any such election. It is a practical measure calculated to exercise an influence on any election and to favor the interests of those with whom the Senator from Missouri and myself are particularly associated. It further carries out the desires of the common council of this District as represented by a vote, a positive resolution of the board which I have in my hands—I will not read it—in which they ask Congress to pass this very bill. I hope, therefore, there will be no delay; and I really would appeal to my excellent friend, the Senator from Maine, to allow this measure to be proceeded with to the end. The naval appropriation bill is sure. He will call it up when this is over, and it will be put on its passage. It cannot fail. The other measure requires that when it is before the Senate it should be kept there until the vote, or if it is not kept there until the vote I fear that its passage may be embarrassed. If it were not important that it should be acted upon now during this brief interval, if really we could afford delay, I would not press it as I do; but feeling its present importance, and that we cannot afford delay, I hope that my friend from Maine will withdraw his opposition and allow us to proceed with its discussion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I feel called upon to say, in reply to the appeal made to me personally by the Senator from Massachusetts, that I do not think he ought to make that appeal to me personally. I am not charged with the conduct of this bill in any personal sense. The Senator will remember that this is the third time I have attempted to conclude the action of the Senate on this naval appropriation bill. It is a matter of public concern, and I do not feel that I am authorized to waive it in favor of any other bill. It is a matter that I must submit to the judgment of the Senate, whether it ought or ought not to be done. I ought to say in this connection that the Army appropriation bill itself is still unfinished; very much in the condition of this bill. Besides, I have reported to-day, from the same committee, a deficiency bill, and have given notice that I shall ask the attention of the Senate to that bill to-morrow. Now, I submit to my honorable friend that he can hardly expect me to take the responsibility of disposing of this matter according to my own personal feelings toward him. I therefore must submit to the Senate to determine whether they will proceed with the order of the day, which is the appropriation bill for the Navy, on which, as I understand, there is but a single question to be concluded, or whether they will proceed and finish this bill, which I greatly fear, from the present aspect of affairs, will occupy the residue of the day.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose the only question to be decided by the Senate is between the relative importance of action on the naval appropriation bill and this bill extending the charter of the city of Washington.

Mr. DRAKE. The relative urgency?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes; I stand corrected—the relative urgency. Mr. President, I suppose not one dollar in the pending appropriation bill will be available before the 30th of June next. It is not the appropriation of money needed now to defray the expenses of the Navy; it is an appropriation of money that will be needed during the coming fiscal year. As has been explained by some members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the charter of the city of Washington expires before the 30th of June, to which day the present fiscal year extends. It expires in the middle of May, and hence legislation is urgent, for we have now nearly reached the middle of April. It is also important that it should be disposed of now, because day after to-morrow, and how many succeeding days cannot be stated with accuracy, the attention of the Senate will be absorbed with grave matters that cannot well be evaded; and then the many measures that have been imperatively delayed will be forced upon our attention, and the Senate will be oppressed with its accumulated business. This bill is before the Senate, and I trust it will be disposed of while it is here and understood. Dispose of it now, and the time of the Senate will be economized.

It may delay for a few minutes the naval appropriation bill, but they can both be acted upon to day. The appropriation bill will certainly not fail, and it would not be injuriously affected by a little delay. During the twelve or thirteen years that I have been honored with a seat on this floor I have never known more than one appropriation bill fail. These considerations I trust will induce the Senate to continue the consideration of this bill and to pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the unfinished business for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the bill that was before the Senate, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Connness, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Cragin, Davis, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Morton, Norton, Stewart, and Vickers—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the majority of the Senate are joined to their idols, and I think for myself I will leave them alone, that they may work out their own deliverance. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator who introduced the amendment what is meant by the first proviso on the second page? I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That when so assembled they may abolish any of the offices now established, not elective by the voters of the city, or change the duties connected therewith, or the compensation thereof, as they may deem proper or necessary for the interests of said city.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to inquire whether it is intended to create a third legislative assembly that shall have control of the power to legislate as to offices, create new ones, abolish old ones, fix the compensation that each of these officers shall receive, &c.?

Mr. HARLAN. I do not think it was the intention of the framers of the bill to confer that power on the aldermen and councilmen when in joint convention. This amendment, I ought to remark, is the substance of a bill that has passed the House of Representatives. If my colleague thinks the bill subject to the objection which he has intimated I will move to amend the amendment by striking out that proviso.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt whether it can be subject to that objection.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us hear your explanation of it.

Mr. SUMNER. The explanation I find in the text of the bill, which I will read. Here is a provision for a meeting of the board of aldermen and the board of common council in joint convention on a particular day to select by ballot officers who are now appointed by the mayor. Then follows the proviso:

That when so assembled they may abolish any of the offices now established—

not elective by the voters of the city.

That is, offices that are municipal in their character and created, as I understand, by municipal ordinance.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, I want to know how they can abolish an office, unless it be a legislative act when they get together? The bill goes on and provides that this convention when it assembles, composed as it is of the two branches of the councils, may elect certain officers that are now subject to appointment by the mayor and confirmed by one of the branches of the councils. Under the bill that is now under consideration, if enacted into a law, they will have the power when thus assembled to abolish the office, to define new duties, to declare that a man who is now comptroller shall also be treasurer, or vice versa, or they may fix his compensation, increase it or diminish it. What I want to know is whether the capacity to do that is not a legislative capacity, and whether it was the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts to create a third legislative assembly?

Mr. SUMNER. In reply to that I will say that I have no special purpose on the subject. I find this clause in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, having already passed that body, and I understand that it was drawn by gentlemen of the District who are particularly interested in the subject and familiar with the operations of the Government.

I then come to the next question of the Senator, as to whether this is not creating what he calls a third branch, and investing it with legislative powers. The Senate will see that it confers upon the boards when in joint convention powers which are sometimes exercised by the two boards apart.

Mr. GRIMES. How? Where?

Mr. SUMNER. A city ordinance usually passes first one body and then the other, and then is signed by the mayor, precisely as an act of Congress passes first one House and then the other, and is signed by the President. But, so far as I understand this proviso, it would vest in the joint convention the power of abolishing certain offices that are not elective by the people. The Senator will see that they are offices that are minor in their character, purely municipal, and that it simply intrusts to this joint convention, when assembled as a joint convention, the power to regulate these offices by abolishing them or by changing their duties. I do not see any harm to come from it; but if the Senator sees harm, and if he really thinks it would be better to throw that overboard, I shall have no objection, particularly as I find his colleague, the chairman of the committee, seems to have no objection to that course.

Mr. NYE. As I understand, there are many officers appointed now who are not authorized by law. For instance, the law provides that there shall be a city surveyor appointed by the city in a certain way, and the law provides that he shall be elected at the annual election. There was one elected, and immediately the board of aldermen convened and appointed another, who has superseded the person elected according to law, and who has been doing the duties ever since. The object of this provision was to authorize this board to abolish that kind of office where it has been created without color and authority of law. That, I presume, was the intention. That there are several such cases I suppose is not to be questioned.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I approve of the object of this measure so far as it appears on its face, and that is, to place the corporation of the city of Washington, with reference to the election of officers, precisely on the same foundation that all others I know of are placed now. It will place it upon the same foundation that it is placed in my own city. The city officers, municipal officers, minor officers, are elected ordinarily in all cities by the two bodies forming the city legislature in convention. They generally meet in convention to elect the minor officers. The provision of this bill is simply that, no more, the two branches of the legislature of the city shall meet in convention to choose the officers, and they may choose whom they please; and if they please to select or elect a colored man, very well; they have a right to do it as the provision stands, and I have no objection to giving them the power. I prefer that it should be made so far democratic as other municipal legislatures are. I see no objection to that; but I do object to the proviso. It is not part of the measure properly; it changes the whole system; it puts legislative power into the hands of a convention which is not done in any other place that I know of. I hope the Senator will himself move to strike it out.

Mr. SUMNER. If any Senator criticises it, so far as I am concerned I will abandon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will strike that out I see no objection to his amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I will consent that it shall go out.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso described by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That when so assembled they may abolish any of the offices now established not elective by the voters of the city, or change the duties connected therewith, or the compensation thereof, as they may deem proper or necessary for the interests of said city.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is, of course, unobjectionable, and its passage may be necessary, as the charter expires, I am informed, next month, and an election is to be held in June, preparatory to which a registration is to be taken under the existing law. But I should like to know what necessity there is for the fourth section of this amendment. It is certainly a novelty in legislation. I never recollect hearing any provision of the kind, here or elsewhere, in the legislation of Congress or in the legislation of the States, for the selection of a financial depository of the moneys of the city. Such selection everywhere is made by some executive officer, and very properly so—some officer who is held responsible for the exercise of the discretion placed upon him, and who may be punished for any corrupt exercise of his power. Here, sir, you propose to put the selection of a financial depository for the District of Columbia into the control of a caucus—a caucus of the city councils. This invites, certainly, to corrupt combination. I am not speaking so much of the particular case here as of the mode of transacting public business, by which, where there is a competition among moneyed men or among moneyed institutions, they will be invited to use their funds for the purpose of controlling caucus nominations. It is certainly a very bad and a very dangerous system which is proposed here. There has been no suggestion that the chief executive officer selects an improper or an unsafe bank. If he is exercising his powers in a doubtful manner there is, doubtless, a remedy; the councils may, in some way, check or direct him, or the people have a remedy in their own hands by selecting a different mayor. But, sir, I think it is a very bad system to have the public moneys of the city of Washington disposable by some caucus arrangement in a legislative body, whether of aldermen or of councilmen. I therefore move to strike out the fourth section of the amendment. It seems to be entirely distinct from any other purpose of the bill on amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. Perhaps it is proper to state that there is no treasurer legally authorized by law to control or take care of the funds of the city, but under the present arrangement the mayor of the city designates a bank to take care of the public money of the city, and that bank becomes, in effect, the treasurer of the city. This amendment is intended to place the appointment of all the minor officers under the joint control of the mayor, the aldermen, and the councilmen. If this is proper in principle it is proper if applied to a treasurer; and that is all there is in that section of the amendment. It virtually provides that the treasurer shall be appointed by the joint action of the mayor and members of the board of aldermen and board of common councilmen, and places that office in the same condition with the other minor offices that are to be filled, if this amendment should become a part of the bill and the bill become a law, under the control of this joint board. If the principle is right, then it is, I think, as applied to a treasurer, and the bank selected to control the money becomes virtually the treasurer for the corporation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to strike out the fourth section of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I have heard no explanation of the necessity of this amendment. We are told that it is to conform the government of Washington city to the form of government in some of the eastern cities. Well, sir, that may be an argument in vindication of the measure against objection; but I do not hear any argument made to show why this change should be now inaugurated and established by act of Congress. It seems to me that this bill looks very much like an attempt to control the patronage of the city. By the first section it is provided:

That it shall be the duty of the mayor of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, the board of aldermen, and the board of common council thereof, to assemble in joint convention at the City Hall, in said city, on the first Tuesday of the first month after the passage of this act, and proceed to select by ballot all officers whose appointments, upon the nomination of the mayor, are now authorized by the charter, or by any law of the United States or act or ordinance of said city, or which may hereafter be authorized thereby.

Now, it seems that these appointments are made under the same guarantees which exist in the selection of officers of the Government of the United States; that is, the mayor has no power of absolute appointment; he nominates, and his nominations are subjected to the confirmation of one branch of the legislative body of the municipality. I am not certain what particular arrangement is made. You have, then, in this city a system for the selection of the municipal officers upon the nomination of the mayor, to be approved by a legislative body, precisely the arrangement provided by the Constitution of the United States for the selection of Federal officers. No gentleman points out any inconvenience which has arisen in this city from the present arrangement, no mischief to be remedied, no public wrong to be righted by legislation. We have simply a bill thrown in here, and the only vindication of it is that there is some precedent for it in the government of some eastern city, but we have no argument applicable to the case itself, no reason why we should depart from the model established by the Constitution of the United States as to the selection of Federal officers. In the absence of any reason given we are left at liberty to infer that for some temporary, some casual reason, it is desirable that this change shall be made for the purpose of controlling the local patronage of this city—an object which ought not, in my judgment, to appeal, or at least to appeal successfully, to the Senate or Congress of the United States. I shall therefore vote against the amendment, and with a very clear mind, because there is no reason assigned for this particular arrangement, and because I am left at liberty to suppose that it is brought on here and pressed upon our attention for partisan reasons alone.

The last clause of the first section of the amendment very carefully provides that any person who is an elector of this city shall be authorized to hold office in the city government. That is, it contains the provision of that bill of which we have heard so much, which was sent to the President and was not signed by him. Of course, sir, I shall not discuss that. I think that this amendment for the purpose of changing the distribution of patronage in the city of Washington and putting the control of the public moneys also of the city of Washington in new hands stands upon no reason whatever, and is open to the objection that it is instigated and is introduced to us for some temporary and petty party purpose which we ought to scout.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCREERY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Morton, Norton, Ramsey, Tipton, Trumbull, and Vickers—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to embarrass this bill, and if the Senator from Iowa thinks the amendment I am about to offer will not embarrass it I should like to have it put on the bill. It has already received the sanction of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I propose to amend the bill by adding as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Washington are hereby authorized to provide for the paving and grading of the streets of said city, and the planting and improving of any of said streets, and they shall assess the cost of such improvements upon the lots adjacent thereto according to the frontage of said lots, to be collected in the mode and manner of collecting other taxes or assessments.

I will state that the only change this makes is that it authorizes the corporate authorities of the city to have some of the wide streets improved in the mode now adopted in Cleveland, Buffalo, and nearly all the cities; that is, to allow the planting of a portion of the wide streets so that they may be improved.

Mr. GRIMES. Does that extend to the avenues?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; merely the streets.

Mr. HARLAN. I suggest to the Senator to insert after the word "streets" the words "and avenues."

Mr. SHERMAN. There is objection to extending it to the avenues.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to the substance of the amendment itself. I do not think it is a correct principle for a city to be allowed to make improvements ad libitum just as it pleases with regard to ornamenting its streets, &c., and charge the expense of that ornamenting upon the owners of the adjacent lots.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that the corporate authorities here have the power now to do it so far as paving and grading are concerned, and this only enables them to make improvements such as planting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If they have the authority so far as paving and grading are concerned, I think it is wrong. The streets are for the general use of all the citizens, and if they select one as more advantageously situated to be improved for the general benefit than another there is no reason, in my judgment, why the expense of that improvement should be assessed wholly upon the owners of the adjacent lots. Some of the owners of the adjacent lots may not choose to pay more than their proportion of the general tax which should be levied for such improvements. Some of the owners of adjacent lots may be very much oppressed by such an assessment; they may be unable to pay it. When you confer the power on corporations for all these matters which are of a general benefit, to select special streets or particular parts of the city and impose the burdens of improving them upon those who own the contiguous lots, it may become so severe as almost to ruin the property-holders. I have known many instances where that has happened. So far as sidewalks in front of a particular lot or building are concerned, it may be very well to require the owner of the adjacent property to pay the expense of them; but when you come to the question of drainage, and all those questions that involve expenditures for general purposes, they should be assessed upon the property of the city equally, and go on by degrees, and the burden should not be placed on a few individuals who may be ill able to bear it. An individual, for instance, may own a lot that is unimproved, and it may be a very severe burden upon him. He may not have the means to ornament and beautify the street in front of his lot as much as might be desired, or even to grade and pave it. The grading and paving of those streets which are of general use, streets where everybody goes, and of which everybody has the advantage, should be assessed on the whole corporation, in my judgment. I always contended against the principle of this proposition everywhere; for I have known very great injury to individuals to arise from it, and I think it is unjust in itself. It is a very pleasant power to possess on the part of a city, to go on improving in that way; but there may be people, and there are always more or less in a city, who have not the means to do it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have contributed to a fund in this city for building a sewer down H street, for poor people who owned a house and lived by sewing, and were not able to pay the tax assessed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It operates very injuriously. A gentleman in this city who was conversing on this subject, a man who never objects to paying his portion of the expense, told me of an instance of a sewer or drain near his property. He owned a piece of property which was perfectly drained from the back side of his house by a drain which he had made himself at considerable expense, and his lot could not be drained in front of it owing to the lay of the land; but still the city built a drain for the benefit of other lots on the other side of the street mostly, in the square, which passed in front of his, and he was assessed $100 for his proportion of the expense of that drain. It was of no possible benefit to him, into which he could not drain his lot by any possibility, and he had already actually constructed his own drain and paid for it in another direction, and yet he was taxed in this way.

Now you come to planting trees and all those things which are ornamental in a street. I think they had better be left to the individuals concerned. The desire of ornamenting a lot upon which a man lives will lead him to do it in process of time; but if you take a city of this kind or of any kind and place this burden which should be borne equally by the whole people for matters of general benefit, and allow the corporation to improve particular streets and assess the property holders on those streets, you put into their hands a power which has been exercised and which will always be exercised to the great injury of some individuals for the benefit of others. My friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests to me that in every case he heard of before two thirds of the property owners were required to petition for the improvement before anything of that sort was done.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to suggest that my colleague has perhaps overlooked what the law is in this District now. A majority of the owners of property on any street or part of a street may require it to be improved by paving and the necessary grading for the pavement and for putting down sidewalks. A majority of them may require it to be done under the law, or the corporation may do it without any such motion on the part of the inhabitants. That is the law now in this District.

Mr. GRIMES. I was not speaking about the law as it is here; but my side remark to the Senator from Maine was that in every case I have heard of except here an application was required from two thirds or three fourths of the property holders adjacent to the proposed improvement before it could be done. I know it is so in my own State, as I have an unfortunate recollection of.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Before my friend from Maine proceeds, I desire to suggest to him that there is now before the Committee on the District of Columbia a memorial on this subject, which I presented myself early in the session, praying for the passage of a law taking from the city authorities this right. I was sent here by a gentleman who happens to own a corner lot, a poor man, to whom great injustice was done, as he said, by making him improve on both sides of his lot, while a rich man, who owned property just by the side of him, but had a narrow frontage, was put to but little expense.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It operates unequally in all cases. I have known cases where a poor person owning a lot of land with a building on it was absolutely turned out of doors, obliged to sell her lot for what she could get for it from absolute inability to meet the burden. If the law is now as the honorable Senator from Iowa says it is, it was passed probably in the early days when a few individuals had everything their own way at the expense of the public, and who, for their own particular benefit, were enabled to use those whom they elected to office in the city. The result of this system is, so far as I have noticed, always the same.

There is no constitution applicable to this city; but a general provision in all our State constitutions is that taxes shall be equal. Now, take the improvement of streets; what are they for? The streets are not made for the benefit of the people who build the houses on those streets and who own the lots along them. A street is laid out for the benefit of the public at large, that they may pass and repass, have good opportunities for ingress and egress, &c., and for the general benefit of the city itself and the improvement of the property of all the citizens. It may be convenient to grade a particular street, and it may be attended with very great expense. It may be proposed to pave one street instead of another, and what is it for? Not for the benefit of the adjacent lots, but because there is a great deal of travel on that street. Take Pennsylvania avenue, for instance, or any other; you want to pave it because there is a vast deal of travel upon it. When the whole body of citizens use that street what propriety is there in saying that for paving it and making it a convenience for the whole mass of the people you will assess the expense upon the individuals who happen to own lots upon that street itself? They are not the people who derive all the benefit from it. It is for the benefit of the whole city, and the whole community should pay for it. Take even the matter of sidewalks; it was for a long time a moot point whether under the provision that taxes should be equal in our State constitution a city could, by ordinance, compel the adjacent owners to pay even half the expense of making a sidewalk in front of their premises. With us it is generally equalized in that way; the city pays one half and the occupants of the lot the other half.

A person may own a considerable quantity of land upon a street in the outskirts of the city. One individual, or two or three individuals, own a particular lot, and it may be for their convenience to have a sidewalk, or to have the street made in a particular way. They may have influence with the mayor and aldermen to get it done; while an individual owning land there, who resides in another part of the city, may be compelled to pay four fifths or five sixths of the whole expense of making the improvement, and be ruined in that way, or be obliged to sell his property. The whole system, in my judgment, of putting so much power into the hands of the officers of municipal corporations, with regard to the property of individuals, is very dangerous. It has worked badly; it oppresses those who are least able to bear the burden, and is used not only for the benefit of the whole city, but often for the particular benefit of those who are most able and are most advantaged by it. I am opposed to the whole principle, and I shall therefore vote against this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to embarrass this bill, and I intimated before that if this amendment was likely to delay it I should not press it.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will withdraw it. I must appeal to him to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I happen to know what the practice of the city authorities of the city of Washington is; and I know that this proposition is in conformity with the general law. They exercise the power of laying down pavements, making sewers, and all those improvements, and assess the cost upon the proprietors in the neighborhood. I will state frankly the reason I have in offering this amendment, so that the Senate may see that I am only promoting a great object of public usefulness. In one of the wide streets of this city the property-owners have been desirous to institute improvements similar to those of Buffalo, Cleveland, and many of the western cities, by inclosing a portion of the wide space and ornamenting it by planting trees, &c. The mayor and city authorities were anxious to promote it, and the proprietors were perfectly willing to undergo the expense; but there was no authority to authorize it; the authority of the city over the streets was disputed, and we were therefore compelled to apply to Congress; but on account of the smallness of the matter and the difficulty of getting through a separate bill, although it was passed by the Senate unanimously, the proposition finally failed. The proprietors along that street desire the privilege of inclosing a portion of the street for the public benefit, in the nature of a park, by planting it with trees. There is no objection on the part of any one.

As to the general principle of making the proprietors pay for such improvements, I have not any doubt of its correctness. No man has a right to own property unless he is willing to conform to the general spirit of improvement going on in his neighborhood. Although particular cases of hardship may arise, yet no city can improve and no city can be made great without considerable power in the local authorities. In Paris they have reduced this to a perfect system; and if the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] who now has charge of the city of Washington, as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, will look to the municipal regulations of the city of Paris he will find the most perfect system in the world for the regulation of improvements. There the city pays a certain portion of the expense, the Government of France pays a certain portion, and the proprietors are divided into classes, first, second, and third, and perhaps others. Those directly benefited on the line of the improvement pay a certain portion; those secondarily benefited pay a certain portion, and those incidentally benefited pay a certain portion of the cost of the improvement. The whole is arranged admirably, so that whenever an improvement is made the expense is adjusted with a careful regard to the interests and the rights of property of the various persons benefited by it. The result has been vast improvements in Paris. Avenues have been cut right through the city, sometimes two or three miles long. Before the first step is taken there is a careful survey, an estimate and analysis of the whole expense of the improvement, a careful estimate of what each person will be benefited by it, and then the whole is adjusted in the way I have stated.

But that is not the law in this country. Here, according to the law as it now stands, the whole expense is levied on the adjoining proprietors. In Ohio we have a general law which requires the proprietors to pay the expense of these improvements. In some cases the law requires a majority of the persons interested along the line of a street to petition for the improvement. In other cases the city authorities have the power to order it without consulting any one; and in certain cases, where two thirds petition, the city authorities are required to make the improvement.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish to introduce a new principle here; but I trust that the Senate will agree to put on this bill so much as I desire to put on it, and to which I think there will be no objection; that is, a provision authorizing the city authorities to allow the streets to be improved according to some general plan to be furnished by them, and the expense to be assessed on the adjoining proprietors. The expense is trifling; it is only carrying out the law as it now stands, but extending the present law to the planting of trees, authorizing the city authorities to allow trees to be planted in front of particular squares.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is simply proposed to allow that to be done I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. But to secure it there must be a general plan, and that plan must be devised by some one; I suppose by the city authorities. Then if persons do not conform to the plan let the expense, which cannot be much for the character of improvement I speak of, be assessed on the adjoining proprietors.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no need of any general plan. If the people choose to do without it let them do without it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not fair.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not fair?

Mr. SHERMAN. Simply because nobody ought to enjoy property without being willing to conform to the general character of the improvements that are necessary for public use, as pavements, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It depends entirely on the character of the people. They may not be able to do it, and there is the thing; you compel people who are not able to join in these improvements. It is all very well for a rich man, who owns a good deal of land and can afford to contribute money for the improvement of his property; it is a very nice thing for him; but for a poor man who owns one house, or for a widow with a parcel of minor children barely able to get along, having only a shelter over her head, this system is oppressive beyond measure.

The Senator talks about the necessity of a provision of this kind. I happen to live in a city which people who have been there call the most beautiful city in the country. It is not a very large one. We were full of trees all over our city; it was called the "Forest City." No such thing was ever heard of there as requiring anybody to set out a tree except public opinion. Public opinion requires that if a man builds a house he shall put trees before it; and he always does, because he wants to look as well as his neighbor. When we had our great fire there the loss that was felt really by the people more than any other was the loss of the trees that had grown up, and which were destroyed. I thought it a very singular thing, when I went home and talked about the suffering and loss in the city, that when I met a man whose house had been burned down I found that he did not speak of his house, but he spoke of his trees. His trouble seemed to be that he had lost his trees. If you get among a people who have enterprise and taste for comfort and beauty they will attend to these things, and they will not ask other people to pay the expense of them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Does not the Senator believe that it is a favor to the property holders to allow them to narrow these broad streets, and appropriate some portion of them to grass and the cultivation of trees?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I do not object to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is the only thing new that is contained in the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. As I understand, the law now goes even further than he proposes in his amendment, as was stated by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I say, if it does, it ought to be altered and the power ought to be taken away if it exists in this city. If the city has power to grade streets and pave streets as it pleases, and do what it pleases with them, and assess the whole expense upon those who happen to live upon the particular streets, it is wrong in principle and oppressive in practice.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I only hope that we shall allow some portion of the streets to be narrowed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not a question of allowance. I am perfectly willing to allow the corporation to do what they please in regard to narrowing the streets and in regard to setting out trees and in regard to grading streets and making other improvements which they deem fit and proper; but when they have done it let them assess the expense on the corporation, to be paid by the people, and not say to an individual who has no money in his pocket, because he happens to live there "You shall be taxed largely for this, which, in reality, is for the benefit of the whole." It is not democratic, it is not consistent with any principle of justice and right; it is not equal in any sense of the word. The whole system is an oppressive one. If the law goes as far as the Senator from Iowa says it does it goes far enough, in all conscience, and I am not disposed to extend it. So far as concerns giving power to the corporation to narrow streets and set out trees and lay out grass in a portion of them, I am in favor of it; but what I am opposed to is the proposition that every man in front of whose property that is done shall pay the expense of what the corporation decide to do, he having no voice in the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have modified my amendment so as to confine it to carrying out the simple purpose I had in view, and I hope in this shape it will not be objected to:

And be it further enacted, That the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Washington are hereby authorized to provide for the planting of any of the streets or parts of streets, and they shall assess the cost of such improvements upon the lots adjacent thereto, according to the frontage of such lots, to be collected in the mode and manner of collecting other taxes or assessments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the same principle. I am perfectly willing to allow them to do it at the general expense; but I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and they shall assess the cost of such improvements upon the lots adjacent thereto according to the frontage of such lots, to be collected in the mode and manner of collecting other taxes or assessments."

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in favor of striking out these words; but what will be the effect of the measure if passed without these words? Will the city not be at liberty, under the general law, to levy the tax upon the proprietors?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are authorized to set out trees, and, of course, if nothing more be said, they are to assess the tax upon the city.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not in the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we strike out the last part of it, and simply give them authority to make the improvements, and they make them, of course they will have authority to lay a tax on the city, and they will put it into their general assessment for city expenses. Then there is no danger of their laying a burden that is too heavy. In the other case they might.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the principle contended for by the honorable Senator from Maine is right. I have observed the operations of the one for which the honorable member from Ohio contends in Baltimore and in this city, and it has, over and over again, almost ruined many poor persons who were along the line of the improvement. Under the power to improve they have been improved out of their property; they have been obliged to sell the land improved in order to pay the assessment for the improvement, and it very seldom brought more than was necessary to pay the expense of the improvement.

I have seen it illustrated here in regard to the pavement and in the construction of a sewer along Fourteenth street. A poor widow lady, owning for life a house at the corner of that street and the avenue, desiring, so far as that house was concerned, no new pavement and no new sewer, was assessed for the construction of a sewer and the laying down of a pavement some nine hundred or one thousand dollars. She was not able to pay it, and I believe she has been compelled to leave the city. She had but a life estate in the property, and the tax was levied upon the tenant in possession. It operates so over and over again. It is not like the method to which the honorable member from Ohio referred as existing in Paris. There commissioners are appointed by the Government, who have no interest whatever in the improvement. They are directed to make a very careful examination. It is not left to discretion. They divide the persons whose property is supposed to be improved into classes, and they levy more upon one class than they do upon another. One third of the whole expense of the improvement there is paid out of the city treasury; another third out of the treasury of the Government; so that two thirds are virtually paid by the Government itself or by its municipality, and one third is left to be paid by those whose property is supposed to be within the range of the improvements. But here the city councils, who are now chosen by general franchise, including black and white, select Tom, Dick, and Harry to estimate the effect of the improvements, and they levy a tax upon whomever they may think proper, without reference to anything except the fact that they are to raise money enough to pay the expenses, and it often operates not only to the loss, but to the ruin of many who are unable to pay for the improvements.

Mr. HOWE. I am inclined to think if this amendment is agreed to the original amendment will be useless, for I take it no city government will ever venture to order the embellishment of any particular street at the general cost of the tax-payers of the city. That would be an extraordinary enterprise for a city government to enter upon.

I agree to most that the Senator from Maine has said. I think, however, it should be accepted with one qualification. I think if a majority of the owners of property on a street ask to have any particular improvement made upon it the city government should make it at the expense of the whole body of the owners on that street. That is the usual provision in cities, I believe. It is said to be the general provision of law here with reference to the other kinds of improvement contemplated by the amendment as first offered by the Senator from Ohio. Now, if the amendment moved by the Senator from Maine is not accepted, I shall move a proviso providing that no such improvement as is contemplated shall be made in any street except upon the application of a majority of the lot owners.

Mr. SHERMAN. Any square.

Mr. HOWE. If squares were contemplated, be it so. Then it will bring these improvements under the operation of the same law which, as I now understand, regulates other improvements in the city.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to an amendment declaring that the improvements should not be made on any particular square except by the consent or on the petition of a majority of the persons in interest on that square.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot move my proposition while the amendment of the Senator from Maine is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. Now I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Ohio by adding to it this proviso:

Provided, That no such improvement shall be ordered upon any street except upon the application of a majority of those owning lots thereupon.

Mr. SHERMAN. These streets are about two miles long. The Senator ought to confine it to the portion proposed to be improved.

Mr. HOWE. Of course that would be the operation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will change his proposition so as to confine it to the consent of a majority of the property owners on the portion of the street to be improved. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOWE. Very well, let it be so modified.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether his amendment means a majority in number of the individuals owning property there, or those owning the greater part of the property there?

Mr. SHERMAN. The frontage.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not understand that the amendment so reads. I understand it requires a majority of all the individuals owning property, not a majority of interest.

Mr. HOWE. I will modify my amendment to read in this wise:

Provided, That no such improvement shall be ordered upon any street except upon the application of a majority of those owning lots adjacent to the proposed improvement.

Mr. DRAKE. I think there is a very serious objection to that. Half a dozen men may own lots each of twenty-five feet in front, and two other men may own lots of two hundred and fifty feet, and just because the number of small proprietors is the greatest they would be enabled to carry the thing one way or the other. It would be an injury to those representing the greater part of the property.

Mr. SHERMAN. A majority of the frontage.

Mr. HOWE. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri makes property more influential and more potential than persons. If his idea prevails, then the one individual who owns two hundred and fifty feet would control the half dozen or dozen who own two hundred and forty feet. Should it be so? I think persons should prevail, and not property.

Mr. DRAKE. The individual owning the greatest part of the property is to pay the greatest part of the expense of the improvement. I never have known an instance anywhere where the individuals, the persons, were to control this thing; but always the amount of property to be taxed to make the improvement controls it.

Mr. HOWE. That is giving a man an influence at the polls in proportion to his wealth, in proportion to his property.

Mr. DRAKE. Not at the polls. There is no election under this. It is a matter of petition to the authorities.

Mr. HOWE. Not at the polls, but at a substitute for the polls. It amounts to precisely the same thing. It is in the government of the city, and he votes according to his property.

Mr. DRAKE. Then the amount of it is just this: if three individuals happen to own twenty-five feet lots upon any street and one other individual happens to own one thousand feet, those three individuals, having only seventy-five feet altogether, may saddle him, whether he wishes it or not, with an expense proportioned to his thousand feet. I do not see the justice of that; and I never heard of such a principle applied in such a case before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DRAKE. Is that open to amendment? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not now. That would be an amendment in the third degree. The Chair understands the proposition has been modified since it was last read, and it will be read as it now stands modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That no such improvement shall be ordered upon any street, except upon the application of those owning a majority of the frontage of the squares adjacent to the proposed improvement.

Mr. DRAKE. That is another thing altogether.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know how it came to be modified in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the way I like it, and I suggested the modification to the Clerk at the desk, but I had no right to modify it.

Mr. HOWE. That is not the way I would like it. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the modification was unauthorized; and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as it stood before to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let it be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Washington are hereby authorized to provide for the planting of any streets or parts of any streets in said city, and they shall assess the costs of said improvements upon the lots adjacent thereto according to the frontage of such lots, to be collected in the mode and manner of collecting other taxes or assessments.

Mr. HOWARD. What does the amendment refer to? The word "planting" is used there, but it does not say what is to be planted—trees or corn or garden fruits or tobacco.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed the intelligent people of Washington, especially as their elections are now by universal suffrage, would know that the proper thing to plant in the streets was trees; but if the Senator has any doubt about it he can make it certain by a slight modification.

Mr. HOWARD. That is rather a remote inference, sir. I think the words "with shade trees" ought to be inserted after "planting."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall vote against this amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, because it involves a debatable question, and, as it seems to me, very much embarrasses the passage of this bill, and it in no way relates to the subject-matter of the bill. I do not think it ought to be attached to the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I must appeal again to my friend, the Senator from Ohio, not to press his proposition on this bill, which is germane to it only in the most general sense.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can vote against it; let us have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Johnson, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Saulsbury—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Morton, Norton, and Vickers—9.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the title by adding thereto the words "Also to regulate the selection of officers, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF R. R. BUTLER.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move now to take up the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with that I ask permission to call up House bill No. 870, relating to the removal of political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, for the purpose of recommitting it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be regarded as before the Senate; and the question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I would make a single remark on the question. I had the floor when this bill was under debate, and was about half through with an argument against it. I, with entire willingness, forego the liberty of continuing my argument, in the hope that the committee, by their careful examination of this subject on those points which I did not go over in my speech, will arrive eventually at the conclusion to which I have arrived by an examination. When this subject was before the committee on a former occasion, as I understand, they did not go into a thorough investigation of the facts. The objection which was considered by them was simply a general objection to special legislation of this sort, and as they overruled that objection they reported the bill, and it came up in due course for the consideration of the Senate without that prior examination of the details of fact to which I invited the attention of the Senate in my former argument. I have only to express the hope that the committee will make as thorough an examination of the facts of this case as I have done, and by undertaking the investigation of this case in any manner they will not require any further speech from me on the subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope so, too; and I hope the committee will furnish the Senate a written report in this case, so that not only we but the country may see what the real facts of the case are.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

REPORT OF IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. DRAKE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, at the close of the pending impeachment trial, five thousand copies of the report thereof, in addition to the number of copies thereof heretofore ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1869, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out "eight" and insert "seven" in line five of the second section.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not propose, sir, to enter upon any extended discussion of this amendment. I have simply to express my gratification that the Senate yesterday enabled me to learn something as to this body which I had not learned before. The very first time I offered a proposition in this body, about a year ago, I was met by the concerted and determined opposition of the committee that reported the bill which I proposed to amend, among whom was the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] and I was informed that the committee was determined to stand by its bill, and the Senate was called upon to vote down the amendment because the committee was determined to stand by its bill. Now, sir, I find that there is a little change in the order of things. The honorable Senator from New York wishes to break down the report of the Committee on Appropriations in the face of the unanimous opposition of that committee and of the Committee on Naval Affairs, too.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. In the first place the Senator is quite mistaken about my encountering the unanimous opposition of those committees; on the contrary he will see by looking at the record that the reverse is quite the fact.

Mr. DRAKE. As to which committee?

Mr. CONKLING. As to the Appropriation Committee. As to the other point, if the Senator will allow me, I will say that when I concurred in this report it was with a full belief that the actual number of the rank and file of the Navy before the war was eighty-five hundred. Finding that I was mistaken a thousand, of course I corrected myself that much.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I stand corrected as to the action of the Committee on Appropriations; but this is an appropriation that has relation to naval affairs, and I believe I am correct in saying that there is not one single member of the Committee on Naval Affairs that is in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York; and yet the honorable Senator from New York, who met me, as I stated, a year ago with the requirement that the report of the committee should be sustained, now wishes to override the reports of two committees. Very well, Mr. President, if it is the mind and will of the Senate that that thing shall be done I am very happy, indeed, to have got this additional amount of light upon the course which the Senate takes in regard to the questions that come before it. If it is to be the understood rule of the Senate hereafter that the report of a committee does not amount to anything in the Senate, and that the opposition of two committees to a particular proposition amounts to still less, then I shall know just exactly what to look for in time to come, and shall shape my action accordingly. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this measure or to presume to give an opinion as to the number of men that should constitute the effective force of our Navy. That belongs to the Senate; but there is a point which I do desire that the Senate shall consider. I make the broad statement, and challenge contradiction everywhere, that seventy-five hundred men as now employed will give an effective force to our Navy three times that which it had prior to the invention of new armament and prior to the introduction of steam as a motive power. The contrary has been suggested on this floor in the fact that steam requires an additional number of men as coal-heavers and as engineers, without considering the other fact that those men were heretofore employed in sailing the ship with the other motive power—that of the wind. A gun now employed—take an eleven or thirteen inch gun—is more effective to-day than the whole armament of the Pennsylvania, of one hundred and twenty guns, that employed nine hundred men to fight her guns. In lieu of them nine or twelve men will fight one of these larger guns.

Every Senator, I have no doubt, who has been interested in the examination of the appliances that have been used in gun-carriages and in labor-saving machinery as applied to the fighting and management of guns, knows that one of these large guns can be fought with as small a number of men almost as was employed in the light caliber guns.

So, sir, I make the assertion, and ask the contradiction of my friend from Iowa if he can, and if he can contradict me he will go, in my judgment, contrary to the accepted opinion of the day—I say that an effective force of seventy-five hundred in your Navy as they are applied to new ordnance, and to engines in place of wind as a motive power, will be an effective naval force in this country three times that which we had before the war.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I suppose that nearly a full answer to the challenge so trenchantly made by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island may be found in this statement of the case: it is stated, and I suppose correctly, that the number of ships in commission now does not exceed the number that were in commission before the war.

Mr. GRIMES. The number of guns afloat is less than before the war, but the number of vessels is a little more, though nearly the same.

Mr. CONNESS. The number of guns is less, the number of ships about the same. Now, sir, the ships constituting the Navy at the present time are manned by a force of nearly twelve thousand men. I take it it will hardly be assumed or stated or asserted by the honorable Senator last up that any of the ships now afloat have a larger number of men than is absolutely necessary to man them.

In fixing the maximum, as is proposed by this amendment, at seventy-five hundred men, or very nearly half the number of men now employed in the Navy, with no greater number of ships afloat and not so many guns, I do not know what the Senator contemplates. It amounts to an abolishment of one half of the Navy of the United States as at present constituted, unless it be held that the Navy Department employ a larger number of men on each ship than is necessary to man or to fight it. I take it there is found in this statement, which the Senator can scarcely contradict, a full answer to his challenge.

Mr. GRIMES. There is some truth in the idea suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, and a good deal of error. In the first place, let me say to him that there is not a fifteen-inch gun afloat.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I did not assert that to-day.

Mr. GRIMES. And I do not think there is a thirteen-inch gun afloat.

Mr. COLE. I think the Senator from Iowa must be mistaken. I understand that is the caliber of the guns of the monitors.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly; but they are not afloat, they are in the harbor all tied up. We are speaking now of vessels that are cruising upon foreign stations. These large guns on a monitor, when controlled and manipulated by an engine below them, do not require a larger number of men than a nine-inch gun, I admit; but, if you transfer that gun to a sailing vessel that is not managed by an engine peculiar to itself, then, instead of having eight men to that gun you must have twenty-six men, and the number of men to handle your gun increases where you have not an engine to manage it, exactly in proportion to the size and caliber of your gun. Does it seem unreasonable to the Senator from Rhode Island that it should be so?

I admit, further, that steam is a much more efficient propelling power than the wind, and if we felt justified in allowing our vessels to steam all the time it would not be necessary for us to employ as many men as we think are necessary, because if we steamed all the time we could take down a great deal of the top hamper of the vessel; but if you did that you would only entail additional expense on the Government by the use of coal. Therefore it has been thought advisable by all Governments—not only our own, but all others—that naval vessels should have their full complement of men for sailing, and that in making ordinary cruises and on ordinary occasions they should sail only, and thus save the expenditure of millions of dollars that would otherwise be used up in the purchase of coal. But, at the same time, it is necessary to have a certain complement of firemen and coal-heavers on board of your vessel, so that if an emergency arises, if a dispatch shall be sent across the ocean to the commander to repair at once to Japan or to Siam, or to any particular point where a national vessel is required to protect American interests, he can go there with the utmost celerity, and then he is authorized to use his propelling power of steam.

Now, sir, as I have accurate information to-day on the subject of the number of vessels that have at different times been afloat and that are afloat now, let me state what is the actual condition of affairs as furnished in a letter by the Secretary of the Navy addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives.

In 1858, when our complement of men was authorized to be eighty-five hundred, but according to the Senator from New York was only seventy-six hundred actually, the number of our vessels was twenty-eight afloat as cruisers. The number of guns they carried was six hundred and seventeen; and their tonnage was thirty-seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven. All those who have paid any attention to the Navy know that at that time nearly all of these vessels were large sailing sloops and frigates, and that they were not as efficient as the steam vessels; they could not penetrate many of the waters that our vessels now run in. In 1859 the number of vessels was thirty-three, of guns six hundred and fifty-four, and the tonnage forty thousand eight hundred and seventy-three. In 1860 the number of vessels was forty-four, of guns six hundred and sixty-four, and the tonnage forty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty. In 1861, at the beginning of the war, the number of vessels was thirty-eight, the number of guns was five hundred and forty-one, and the amount of tonnage was forty-two thousand seven hundred and thirty-eight.

In 1868, at the beginning of this year, the number of vessels was fifty-three, the number of guns four hundred and ninety-seven, and the amount of tonnage fifty-eight thousand five hundred and twenty-five. In other words, we have fifty-three vessels in 1868 in January, against forty-four vessels in 1860. We had in January of this year four hundred and ninety-seven guns afloat, and we had in 1860 six hundred and sixty-four, or nearly two hundred more guns than we have now. We have now fifty-eight thousand five hundred and twenty-five tons of tonnage, and we had then forty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty. Now, let not the conclusion be drawn from the fact that we have two hundred guns less afloat now than we had in 1860, that our guns are larger now and much more efficient, for that is hardly the case. It was the thirteen and the fifteen inch guns that were introduced during the war; the nine and the eleven inch guns were the guns of the Navy long prior to the war; and of eight-inch, nine-inch, and eleven-inch guns we had nearly two hundred more afloat in 1860 than we have to-day. We have now, it is true, several more vessels; but the tonnage has not increased in proportion, and the guns are diminished. The vessels are small, and as I have already told the Senate, they now penetrate waters that it was never thought we should penetrate with a vessel of war, all through the streams of China and Japan, and among the Eastern islands. The Secretary of the Navy says:

"Included in the fifty-three vessels noted as in the squadron service upon the 1st of January last are six store and hospital vessels, besides the Mahaska, which can never again go to sea, and is used as a guard and living ship for officers and men in charge of iron-clads at New Orleans; also, the Yantic, which has been detained for months above the bar at Tampico, so that the effective naval force was actually forty-five vessels, four hundred and fifty-one guns, and fifty-one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six tonnage. All of the cruising vessels are steamers, though most of them can and do move with sails when speed or the circumstances of the case do not require steam. The expense of keeping the squadrons in commission is greater now than when nearly all the ships were sailing vessels, for fuel has become a large item of expenditure, and incidentally the depreciation of our currency adds largely to the expense, thereby necessarily increasing the estimates."

Another reason why there is necessarily a considerable increase in the number of men, grows out of the fact that the war has left us in a peculiar condition. We are now compelled to employ one hundred and thirty-nine men to take care of the iron-clad and other vessels which are in our hands and which we are attempting to sell at New Orleans. We employ three hundred and seventeen men on vessels that are now in ordinary; vessels that are laid up; that we cannot dispose of; that we must keep; that we must preserve; and that may at some future time be useful. There was no necessity for such men before the war. Then there are on the Tonawanda, another iron-clad at the Naval Academy, eighteen men, making in all four hundred and seventy-four. The Tonawanda is used for various purposes, and among others, I believe, for a powder magazine. There are, then, four hundred and seventy-four men used for such purposes.

Now, Mr. President, let me say a word in regard to the enormous expense that is supposed to be incurred. A gentleman spoke to me to-day inquiring whether or not it was a fact that it cost as much to support a man in the Navy as it did in the Army; and because it has been said that it cost one thousand or eleven hundred dollars a year to support a man in the Army, the inference was drawn that it cost just as much to support a man in the Navy. I have taken the trouble to investigate that subject a little to-day. In order to make out the amount of one thousand or eleven hundred dollars expended annually on a man in the Army it is necessary to add together all the appropriations made for the support of the Army, and then to divide that aggregate by the number of men in the Army. That aggregate includes the expense of the transportation of the quartermaster's department, the commissary stores, the surgeon general's department, and all the officers of the Army.

Now, sir, suppose that a thousand men be divided equally into seamen, ordinary seamen, and landsmen. That would not be the proportion, because there would be a greater number of landsmen than of seamen or ordinary seamen; but suppose they be equally divided, what would be the expense? You would have three hundred and thirty-three seamen whose pay is twenty dollars a month, amounting to $6,660; you would have three hundred and thirty-three ordinary seamen at sixteen dollars a month, amounting to $5,328 a month; and you would have three hundred and thirty-three landsmen whose monthly pay would be $3,663, making the aggregate monthly pay of the whole nine hundred and ninety-nine men $15,651, which, multiplied by twelve, makes a sum total of their annual pay $187,812. Then their rations at thirty cents a day would amount to $3,600 a month. It must be remembered that a sailor is compelled to pay for his clothing out of his pay. The only additional expense these thousand sailors can be to the Government, possibly under any circumstances, will be the medicines that will be used in curing them if they get sick, and the expense they may be to the Government when they are sent to hospital. It must be remembered, however, that when they are sent there they are supported with funds taken out of their own pay, saving and excepting the amount we pay for officials, nurses, and attendants. Thus it appears that the whole expense incident to one thousand men, which everybody in the Navy deems to be necessary, would only amount to about two hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. President, I believe I have attempted to state the case as fairly as I possibly could.

have no particular interest in keeping up this number. I would not advocate it for a moment if I did not believe the public interest would be subserved by it. I stand alone among all those who may be regarded as being friends of the Navy, in being willing to reduce it down to eighty-five hundred men. This reduction does not meet the approbation of the Department; it did not meet the approval of a single member of my committee, so far as I know, and I thought I was going a great way in proposing to reduce it down to that number.

With these remarks, Mr. President, I am content to leave the subject in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I intend now, as I think I have done heretofore, to go for those measures of economy which will serve the public interests; but I do not intend to run a muck at every bill about which I do not know as much as the various committees who have charge of them do. In this instance I believe the Senator from Iowa is a safe leader to follow. He certainly is not in favor of any kind of extravagance in the Navy, so far as I have ever observed, watching his course; and I do not believe in reducing our Navy down to the old gunboat system of Thomas Jefferson.

Improvements have taken place, and such improvements as no doubt give our Navy a greater effective force than it had prior to the war; but the navies of other nations have improved in about the same ratio; so that, relatively, we do not stand better now, perhaps, than we did prior to the war; and it does require, in my judgment, more men to man the vessels which are propelled by steam and wind than it did when the propelling power was only sails. It looks to me as though the reduction that has been proposed is, as far as it is prudent for us, having in view the public welfare, to go, I shall therefore oppose the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am always in favor of a just economy; but I do not believe that retrenchment is always economy. Indeed, I have a very different opinion, both in relation to public and private affairs. From the time that I knew anything at all about it I have been a most decided friend of the Navy; and I continue to be so, not only of the military navy, but of the commercial navy of the United States. I regard the Navy as the most important arm of our public defense. The geographical position of other Powers, and their own intrinsic strength in relation to the United States, are such as to render a standing army almost unnecessary to our country. We are in contact with England in her Canadian dominions; we are in contact with Mexico; but neither of those Powers, with any feelings of hostility, could at all affect our security or our interests in a military point of view. Our contact with foreign nations is mainly upon the ocean, and it is in the strength and efficiency of our Navy that our national force is to be most imposingly demonstrated to foreign Powers.

The Navy is not unfriendly to liberty. The Navy is not unfriendly to a free and popular Government. There is no nation that has ever been free that I have any knowledge of whose essence or form of freedom has not been lost by the agency of armed men. One of the early American principles, as far as I have learned them, has been to foster the Navy and to have a standing Army of the smallest possible number. I frankly admit that I am a proselyte to both those theories. I want a strong and an efficient Navy. I would be willing to vote for a small increase of the naval force. I am in favor of the policy of keeping up the Navy at least to its present strength and efficiency and to evolve and increase it in proportion to the increase of the nation, of its population, resources, and power. I have taken as much pride in the Navy, both mercantile and military, as I have in any institution belonging to our country. All the achievements of the American Navy, in war and peace, have been a source of pride to me and of the highest national and patriotic pleasure. I still cherish those feelings. I want the time to return to our country when we shall be the largest commercial people on the globe; that is, when we shall have the largest commercial marine. I want to encourage and sustain ship-building. I want to do it by granting every facility to the business of ship-building and by so acting that we shall become the carriers of the world; and to this end I will sustain every measure that is at all proper; and gentlemen who favor such a policy as that will always find in me an humble, but a true and most earnest advocate of it.

I am especially favorable to the Navy because it in no degree imperils or endangers our institutions and our constitutional and popular liberties; and those very considerations induce me always to be distrustful of, and inimical to, a standing army. That jealousy and distrust and unfriendliness to a standing army which distinguished the early and able American statesmanship I have imbibed. I still cherish those sentiments. I believe now that the Army is three or four times as large as it should be. Instead of the Navy being too large, and having too many sailors, I believe it is rather too small and has rather too few sailors; and, as I said before, I would be willing myself and always will be found willing, to meet the responsibility of its just and reasonable enlargement according to the growth and resources and power of our country.

Mr. President, I have some facts in relation to the Army. In 1858 the authorized force of the Army was eighteen thousand one hundred and sixty-five; its actual force was seventeen thousand four hundred and ninety-eight. The expenditures of the Army for that year were $12,888,740 73. This year the expenditures of the Army swell up above the sum of one hundred million dollars, and the actual number of soldiers, according to the last authentic report that I saw, was upward of fifty-eight thousand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend undoubtedly intends to be just.

Mr. DAVIS. That is my wish.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He should consider that in that sum are included the bounties and the expenditures of the Indian war.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; that I understand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; not the bounties of last year. The expenses of the War Department of this year are estimated including the bounties.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And they will go up to $124,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I took the figures and exposition of my honorable friend from Indiana in relation to this subject given a few days ago. He had investigated the subject, and, if I recollect his statement, it was that the estimates for the Army, independent of the pension-list, would exceed $100,000,000. I took it to be authentic and true then, and I shall continue to do so until the contrary is shown.

Now, sir, the expenses of the Army for the past year have exceeded those of 1858 upward of eight times. In 1858 the amount was $12,888,740 73; last year upward of one hundred million dollars. In the year 1859 the authorized force of the regular Army was eighteen thousand one hundred and sixty-five; the actual force was seventeen thousand four hundred and ninety-eight; and the available force eleven thousand. During that year the expenditures for the Army were $17,656,619 19. In the year 1860 the authorized strength of the Army was eighteen thousand one hundred and fourteen men, and the actual force was sixteen thousand and six men. The expenditures for the same time were $15,658,000 and a fraction. Now, when the Navy, according to economical statesmen, is to be kept to the same establishment and to the same force that existed previous to the war, I ask upon what principle of reason, of public defense, of safety to the country and its institutions, the Army shall be raised to three times the amount and its expenditure to seven or eight times the amount that it was in those respective years?

Sir, there are subjects upon which retrenchment and economy can go hand in hand, and one of the great and important subjects upon which both of these principles can move is the Army. I am against heavy and burdensome taxation; but neither taxation nor any other public question has any terrors for me. I am willing to meet any question whatever; and so far as the public service of the country requires a liberal expenditure to sustain the Navy, to maintain its power relatively to the people of the world, and to keep up with the improvements in naval architecture and naval warfare and naval armament, I am willing to meet any expenditure that is necessary to these great national ends, and I am willing to throw myself upon the justice and reason of my constituency to sustain my position.

I am not willing under a cry of retrenchment to cripple the Navy, to reduce it below a proper standard as to vessels, tonnage, guns, and men; and especially am I not willing to make this reduction when there is that enormous standing Army at such an immense cost to the people, and which exists in its numbers only to endanger the rights of the States, the liberties of the people, and our constitutional form of government. I am utterly unwilling to sustain an Army in such dimensions and at such a cost, and at the same time to make a pretext of economy in relation to restricting the Navy to what it was before the war.

Mr. President, I believe to-day that ten thousand men in our standing Army would be amply sufficient for all the just demands of the Government and the country. I proposed a few days ago that it should be reduced to twenty thousand; and that would be an increase upon the force in the year before the war of about three thousand men; and certainly twenty thousand men would be amply sufficient to answer all the just purposes of the Government and the country. Gentlemen who opposed the reduction of the Army and a restriction of its expenses such as would be produced by a reduction of the Army according to the propositions that were made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] and myself, cannot seduce nor frighten me into a crippling of the Navy upon the cry of retrenchment and economy.

Mr. President, I go for my country, my whole country. I go for the maintenance of the Constitution and of all the powers of the General Government under it. I go for the maintenance of the Union. I go for the rights of the States under the Constitution and every right of the States under the Constitution. I go for a just and enlightened and proper maintenance of our complicated system of government, partly national and partly State; and to maintain the public service of the General Government I am willing to vote every dollar that according to just reason and enlightened policy may be necessary. And, especially, I go for the Navy. In my boyhood I read of "The Saucy Jack," and "The True Blooded Yankee" scouring the British coasts up the channel and the Dover Straits; I read of the gallant resistance made by the privateer General Armstrong; I read of the battle of Lake Erie, on the 10th of September, my birthday; of the battle on Lake Champlain, where McDonough triumphed; of all the great naval battles in which our gallant tars met and vanquished the proud mistress of the seas; and my boyish heart glowed then with as much pleasure at those recitations as that of any Yankee tar whose sons and brothers were bringing these glorious victories upon the common banner of our country. And now, in my age, my heart warms, the ashes and cinders that glow here warm at the recollection of those noble deeds; and never, never will I abandon that arm of the public service that contributed thus to the glory, renown, and power of our common country. I therefore go for sustaining the Navy; and I would go for increasing the force if the honorable chairman was to propose that it should be increased.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I did not mean again to encroach upon the attention of the Senate in reference to this amendment, nor should I do so now but that I have in my hand evidence to which I think we shall all be compelled to bow upon some of the questions which were in difference yesterday.

Quite late in the debate a suggestion was made by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that the introduction of steam had multiplied the number of men per vessel which was necessary; and when the suggestion was made that there were fewer vessels now than anterior to the war, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs met that by the statement that although there were fewer guns afloat now than then, the number of vessels was greater now than then. In order that I may do him no injustice I beg to call attention to the statement which he made, as it appears in the Globe.

But before doing so, Mr. President, I beg to drop one remark which may not occur to me again. I dissent, for one, entirely from the idea that any committee, whatever that committee may be, or that any chairman of a committee, however experienced or distinguished he may be, is to give upon the floors of Congress a weight to his opinion, or the opinion of the committee, which goes beyond the facts upon which that opinion is founded. No man's opinion, I humbly submit, is worth any more than the facts and the considerations upon which that opinion rests entitle it to. If any Senator chooses, like the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL] to adopt the idea that a particular Senator is usually a safe leader, and, shutting his eyes to all facts, to vote in a given direction, I am perfectly aware that I shall address in vain to him the presentation of evidence which I wish to make. But if, on the contrary, the Senate, like other tribunals, is to pass upon questions by taking the facts and the arguments, where facts and arguments can be deduced, as controlling considerations, I believe there can be no doubt as to the just vote upon the proposition before us.

In justice to myself, perhaps, I ought to make a qualifying remark. I am aware that a great variety of questions are presented to all bodies, the evidence and facts in reference to which it is impossible to have assembled all before us; and upon those questions the opinions of experts, whether committees or chairmen, are valuable, and must be received as entitled to great weight. But I insist, again, that upon a question where all the facts with regard to which can be and are brought before us, it is our business as legislators to predicate our vote on those facts, and not on the version or the opinion of any one, and particularly not on the shifting version or shifting opinion he may receive from somebody else.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa, speaking upon the information which he had, informed the Senate thus:

"Our vessels are more numerous, but they do not carry as large an armament. We are now obliged to keep vessels on the coast of China and in the ports of Japan and the Eastern Archipelago, going up their rivers and protecting the commerce of this country in that region of the world, at a greater expense than we did before."

And it was upon that statement of the honorable chairman, and upon the kindred statement, the twin of this, that more men were required upon steam-going vessels than upon sailing vessels, that a doubt was cast upon the propriety of this amendment, and that a large part of the Senate voted against it. Following in this wake, the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] said over and over again, in the same spirit in which my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], who does me the honor at this moment to give me his attention, has often remarked here that we were leaping in the dark, we were moving in the dark—the honorable Senator from Indiana, I say, in that same spirit reiterated that we were acting here without figures, without facts, and who knew that we could safely reduce the Navy to the point at which the Navy stood anterior to the war?

Now, Mr. President, let me see whether we shall not know all about it. I ask Senators to give their attention to a letter which I hold in my hand, and which letter was addressed this day by Commodore Smith, the chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting—

Mr. BUCKALEW. To whom?

Mr. CONKLING. Addressed to myself. I addressed to the Commodore several interrogatories, I think four—the number will appear from his letter—in order to sift the facts if I could, and the letter which I have in my hand is in response to those questions. Now, sir, let us compare it with the information we had yesterday, and let us compare it with the argument made sometime ago by the Secretary of the Navy addressed to the chairman of the House Naval Committee to show that a very large Navy was necessary:

"WASHINGTON, April 7, 1868.

"SIR: In answer to the interrogatories contained in your note of yesterday, I have the honor to state:

"1. There were in 1859-60, eighty-nine vessels in the Navy—

Not thirty-three vessels, as I understood the chairman to read from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, but eighty-nine vessels in the Navy—

"carrying"—

Not, as I understood him to read, six hundred and fifty-four guns, but—

"eighteen hundred and sixty-four guns.

"2. There are in commission, in active service, in foreign and home squadrons, fifty-seven vessels carrying five hundred and twenty-one guns, and three apprentice vessels carrying fifty-two guns, making a total of sixty vessels and five hundred and seventy-three guns."

So that as five hundred and seventy-three is to eighteen hundred and sixty-four, so is the number of guns afloat now compared to the number of guns afloat anterior to the rebellion; and as sixty vessels, including the apprentice vessels, is to eighty-nine, so is the number of vessels now floating compared with the number which floated anterior to the rebellion.

"3. The largest vessel in service prior to 1860 was the Roanoke, carrying forty guns and five hundred and twenty-five men.

"4. The Franklin is the most efficient vessel now in commission, and carries thirty-nine guns."

Mark, Mr. President, only one gun less than the Roanoke carried, with all their increased caliber and capacity—

"and five hundred and seventy-two men."

Only forty-seven more men than the old Roanoke carried are carried by the Franklin, that magnificent frigate, the pride, and, in one sense, the wonder of the American Navy, albeit, in my humble opinion, she is spending her time just now in a ceremony "more honored in the breach than the observance." But, sir, I am upon the point in reading this last item, whether it be true that a vessel carrying the same number of guns of greatly increased dimensions involves and necessitates the employment of a number of men as eight is to twenty-six, if I understood the proportions given this morning. Now, sir, what do we find? We find here before us a proposition denounced, which proposition is to leave in the Navy as many men as ever were in the Navy before the war began, and add to that number two hundred and fifty. For what purpose? For the purpose of manning two thirds as many vessels carrying less than one third as many guns. Is it a leap in the dark, I beseech Senators? Is it a random shot at reform without understanding what we are talking about? Or is it a demonstration, as far as anything is demonstrable by figures of the nature of this, that here is the appropriate place and time not to dissent from what the House has done, to which we have added two hundred and fifty already, but to agree to it? Is there any doubt about these facts?

Mr. GRIMES. Will you have that letter read?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly. I have read the whole of it. Do you wish to have it sent to the desk and read by the Secretary?

Mr. GRIMES. Let me see it.

Mr. CONKLING. I will read it all the way through as a part of my remarks, and then send it to you:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING,
WASHINGTON, April 7, 1868.

SIR: In answer to the interrogatories contained in your note of yesterday, I have the honor to state—

1. There were in 1859-60, eighty-nine vessels in the Navy, carrying eighteen hundred and sixty-four guns.

2. There are in commission, in active service in foreign and home squadrons, fifty-seven vessels, carrying five hundred and twenty-one guns, and three apprentice vessels, carrying fifty-two guns, making a total of sixty vessels and five hundred and seventy-three guns, being exclusive of receiving ships and tugs employed at navy-yards.

3. The largest vessel in service prior to 1860 was the Roanoke, carrying forty guns and five hundred and twenty-five men.

4. The Franklin is the most efficient vessel now in commission, and carries thirty-nine guns and five hundred and seventy-two men, exclusive of apprentices and marines.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. SMITH, Chief of Bureau.

The letter is addressed to me. It is at the service of the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I think I am warranted in saying that the action taken by the Senate in committee, which is sought to be reversed now, is quite inside of safety, because if you admit all that has been said as to the increased force of the steam vessels, which proposition is contradicted by that letter, as I submit—

Mr. GRIMES. In what respect?

Mr. CONKLING. In respect of the fact that the Franklin, the master ship of the Navy, carrying, as she does, thirty-nine guns, only one less than the old Roanoke, which carried forty, has of her crew only forty-seven more men, which forty-seven more men are necessitated by all that is implied in the increased caliber of her guns and in the increase of necessity necessary to manage her tackle, apparel, and furniture, whatever it may be.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator understand that the Roanoke was a sailing vessel?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I do not understand how that was. I made no statement about it. I am speaking of the Franklin. I shall be indebted to the honorable chairman if he will tell me what the Roanoke was.

Mr. GRIMES. She was a steamer; and so far as I know was never in commission. She was a steamer built at this navy-yard, and in launching her she broke her back. She was afterward changed into an iron-clad, and has three turrets upon her, and is stationed, I think, at New York, but I am not certain.

Mr. NYE. She is at Brooklyn now.

Mr. CONKLING. I see my honorable and naval friend from Nevada—

Mr. NYE. You will see him again in a few minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. I see he rose upon that as if he considered that a significant fact, as I have heard counsel sometimes emphasize something very much. Will he do me the favor, as I profess but little nautical knowledge, to inform me of the precise weight of the fact just stated about the Roanoke?

Mr. NYE. I am holding no controversy with the Senator from New York. I have not said a thing. I intend to say something in a minute.

Mr. CONKLING. I am afraid my honorable friend is not so good natured as he naturally is.

Mr. NYE. I intend to pay my respects to the gentleman's naval skill as soon as he gets through.

Mr. CONKLING. I certainly do not wish to molest my honorable friend; but he rose with an emphasis and turned around with an ejaculation and manner which led me to suppose that there was something stunning in the fact which the honorable Senator from Iowa stated, and I wished to be knocked down by degrees, if there was, by being gradually informed what the weight of that information was.

Mr. NYE. In a moment of thoughtlessness I rose without consulting the Senator from New York as to the manner in which I should get up or sit down. I will not do it again. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, I wish to withdraw what I said. I rather think the Senator is pretty good natured after all. I thought from his first remark that his habitual good nature or good spirits had abandoned him for a moment; but I am inclined to think he is very good natured, and I therefore withdraw that remark, and that makes it all right.

Now, sir, without addressing the question to the honorable Senator, who does not like me to address it to him, I beg to submit to the Senate what pertinency and weight has the fact that the Roanoke broke some of her machinery, if that was the statement, when she was launched? What of that? She was the largest vessel in the Navy, and she had her complement of men furnished to her. How? As a question of skill, as a matter of art in the Navy. What was it? Five hundred and twenty-five men. Is it of any consequence that she met with an accident in being launched? Is it of any consequence that she commenced her career shortly before the war and was transformed into a three-turret gunboat, or whatever she was? Suppose the Franklin had been constructed before the war, and had been burned up at the Gosport navy-yard, would it not be just as instructive to refer to her in order to ascertain what her equipment was?

I did not ask Commodore Smith anything about the Roanoke. I simply propounded to him the question which vessel anterior to the war was the most powerful vessel carrying the largest armament and crew; and he, competent, I hope, to select the vessel which answered that description, named the Roanoke as being that vessel. I do not know but that a landsman, one who knows as little about this as I do, for I know but very little—I do not say that with ceremony; it is truer than I wish it was—I do not know but that one as ignorant of the nautical branches of this subject as I am is bound to believe that because the Roanoke met with an accident in being launched, and because she did not live long enough before she was transformed to make trips and to have a record, therefore the Commodore has made a great mistake in citing the Roanoke as showing what he adduces her to show; but I am unable to see it.

This statement, if I am able to apprehend it, as I commenced by saying when I was broken off by the question of my friend from Iowa, shows, in the first place, that, allowing all that can be claimed as to the increase of force necessary owing to the adoption of steam, the disparity is so great between the number of guns afloat and of vessels afloat now and then that seventy-six hundred men, with the twelve hundred and fifty added, which number we have added, is a far more numerous provision, a far more abundant provision, in reference to the vessels and the guns now afloat than we ever had anterior to the rebellion. And that must be apparent, I think, upon simply bearing in mind the proportions that we have now, less than one third the number of guns and only two thirds the number of vessels.

One word more, Mr. President, and I have done. I despair of finding anything which will satisfy the honorable Senator from Kentucky, at all events, as to the proper object of retrenchment or of economy, if that was the word that he used. I have no expectation of that; and, as to everybody, it may be a very difficult thing to find the precise and appropriate object. But I beg to say, in extenuation for the discourse that I have inflicted upon the Senate in reference to this subject, that I have no purpose in the world except that which I presume other Senators have in the same general way, to find as often as I can an appropriate occasion to reduce expenditures, and then to propose to do it, and to vote in that direction. I have no idea that I have a wish on that subject which is peculiar to me, or which, by comparison with the wishes of other Senators, would show any sort of superior sincerity or earnestness on the subject; but we are all compelled to go according to the lights which we have. The Senator from Kentucky judges for himself. He thinks the Army is the appropriate place to retrench. I agree with him; and I beg to say to him that, as far as my discernment will permit me to see the right direction for retrenchment there, I will go with him on the first and the last and all intermediate occasions.

Mr. DAVIS. You have not done so yet.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend should hardly say that to me, and I will tell him why; and I think he will be just enough to admit it. The other day upon an appropriation bill, where the House of Representatives had made no provision in reference to the reduction of the Army, where that question was not up, an amendment was offered reducing the Army. I objected to it upon a specific ground, namely, that that subject was not before us; that I was in favor of action in the right direction, and not in the wrong, when we came to it; but that, inasmuch as it was not before us, I thought it should be postponed to an appropriate bill. Now, mark the distinction, if the honorable Senator pleases. Here comes a proposition from the House, which we do not propose to strike out, and to say "it is not germane; it is foreign substance here; we will eliminate it and take this subject up again;" but we do propose to act upon it. It has been reported back by the committee, and the Senate proposes to allow to stand in this bill words which shall fix the number of the Navy. Therefore the Senator will see that it is not on all fours at all with the proposition made the other day in regard to the Army. There the objection was that that was not the appropriate bill on which to consider it. That objection is foregone here, because it is admitted on all sides that we are to consider it, and consider it in this bill.

Then we come to the proposition whether we are to be content with adding two hundred and fifty to the number fixed by the House, or whether we are to have a thousand more than that, an addition of twelve hundred and fifty; and that, too, upon as clear a mistake, as clear a surprise upon the Senate as ever afforded ground for relief in a court of equity. Why? Because the majority of Senators who voted for it, of whom I am one, and of whom, I venture to say, my honorable friend by my side [Mr. WILSON] is another, never doubted that eighty-five hundred was the actual number, not the possible number, not the theoretical number, not the "legal standard," as it has been called, but the actual number of men in the Navy, borne upon the pay-rolls anterior to the rebellion. Believing that we voted to put the Navy back where it was. And now, when we find that we voted under a mistake of a thousand, and when we demonstrate, as I submit, over and over again upon the figures that the complement as it stood in point of fact is abundantly large, we are to be asked, without any argument except that which I submit this letter of Commodore Smith completely refutes, to turn around and add a thousand men to the number fixed by the House, after having already added two hundred and fifty, making twelve hundred and fifty in all, involving an expense the amount of which, I am informed, is very much larger than that suggested by the honorable Senator from Iowa, I do not venture to make any statement about it, because I have no information sufficiently accurate; but I understand that it involves an expenditure a great deal larger than that which he suggests. That, then, is the statement; that is the proposition; and we cannot avoid it by saying we will consider it on some other bill; but upon this bill, and now, every Senator is to say whether he thinks it should be one number or should be the other number.

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for all the time I have occupied on this subject. I have endeavored to discharge my duty, and there I leave it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have only a word to say in reply to the Senator from New York and the letter that he has introduced. I do not propose to argue this question over again, or to allude to the subjects that have been under discussion during yesterday and to-day that we have already talked about. In regard to the first of his discourse as to that which should govern Senators in their conduct of public affairs, I have not a word to say, except this, that I have never arrogated to myself any particular knowledge upon naval affairs. It has so happened that during my past life I have been brought into rather intimate connection with the subject, and during the term of my service in the Senate I have been on the Naval Committee. I have done the best that was in my power so inform myself upon the subjects that came before that committee, and I have honestly attempted to convey the information that I have obtained to the body of which I was a member.

Now, sir, what is this letter that the honorable Senator from New York has introduced here with such a flourish of trumpets, and which he imagines is to have a terrible effect or a great effect upon the sentiment of the Senate on this matter? It seems that yesterday or to-day he addressed a letter to Commodore Smith, the chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. I suppose the Senator's first inquiry—I judge from the response—was as to the number of vessels that were in the service of the United States belonging to its Navy in 1859-60, to which he has received an answer saying, that there were eighty-nine vessels, and that they carried eighteen hundred and sixty-four guns. The Senator would have obtained that information if he had simply looked into the Navy Register of 1860, or if he looks into the Navy Register of 1868 he will see that the number of vessels we have now is counted by hundreds, and that the number of guns is counted by thousands in place of hundreds.

But what has that to do with the question under consideration? The question for the Senate to consider is, what is the number of men requisite to keep that number of cruisers afloat, to show our flag, and to protect our commerce in foreign seas, that may be necessary—not what may be the number of hulks that are laid up at our docks; not what may be the number of vessels that are in ordinary at home; not what may be the number of iron-clads at St. Louis or Mound City or New Orleans. He would get a response in reply to a similar inquiry addressed to Commodore Smith to-day, in which he would have all those included. The analogy that he draws between the number of men and the number of vessels then acting as cruisers, and the number of vessels that we had at home and guns that we had at home, that were not afloat, I am not able to see the applicability of. Doubtless it is owing to the dullness of my apprehension.

Commodore Smith says that there are fifty-seven vessels carrying five hundred and twenty-one guns now in service and three apprentice vessels carrying fifty-two guns, making a total of sixty vessels and five hundred and seventy-three guns, being exclusive of receiving ships and tugs employed at the navy-yards. The Secretary of the Navy says in his report, made in January or February, that the number of vessels afloat as cruisers—and he specifies the particular squadrons that they compose—was fifty-three, whereas this letter of Commodore Smith's shows it was fifty-seven, a discrepancy of four vessels; and it is accounted for in this way: we have recently put into commission the Contoocook, the Wampanoag, the Piscataway, and other vessels that are sent to foreign stations to relieve vessels there that are to be sent home, and they have been sent to sea since the letter was written to Mr. PIKE, of the House of Representatives, by the Secretary of the Navy. When those other vessels that have been on foreign stations, as for example the Hartford in the Chinese waters, come home, they will be laid up in ordinary, and the number of cruisers afloat of course will be diminished to that extent. That accounts for the discrepancy. The number of guns afloat, according to Commodore Smith, was five hundred and twenty-one guns upon the cruisers, instead of four hundred and twenty-seven; and that is to be accounted for in the same way; the vessels that have been sent out and the ones that are to be relieved both being included in this list.

I judge that the Senator also made this inquiry: what was the largest vessel in the service before the rebellion, to which Commodore Smith answers, "the largest vessel in service prior to 1860 was the Roanoke, carrying forty guns and five hundred and twenty-five men." She may have been a ton or two, a very few tons, larger than the vessels of her class. The old Senators here will remember that we authorized, some fifteen years ago, the building of five steam frigates, the Wabash, the Minnesota, the Merrimac, that was destroyed at Norfolk, and the Roanoke. The Roanoke was built at this place. She was built for a complement of five hundred and twenty-five men. She was a steamer. She was about the same capacity as the Franklin.

Then, I suppose, the Senator asked what is the most efficient vessel in our service to-day, to which the Commodore responds, "the Franklin is the most efficient vessel now in commission, and carries thirty-nine guns and five hundred and seventy-two men, exclusive of apprentices and marines." Marines are never counted as a part of the ship's complement. She is also a steamer. There is not any very material difference between the tonnage of the two vessels. At any rate, according to this report, there is only a difference of one gun. The Roanoke carried forty guns and the Franklin carries thirty-nine guns. The Franklin's number of men is five hundred and seventy-two, and the Roanoke's complement of men was five hundred and twenty-five, there being some thirty-odd men more for the Franklin now afloat with thirty-nine guns than would be required for the Roanoke if she had been afloat, with forty guns. Now, what deduction does the Senator draw from that? I did not see the conclusion that he reached. I suppose—

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. GRIMES. I do, indeed.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say that I draw this deduction from it: that taking the addition which appears there it does not account at all when you make allowance for the reduced number of guns and vessels, for the necessity of even the increase that we give. If I do not state it clearly in that form, allow me to state it the other way: taking the addition of force shown to be necessary by this additional number of men, when you take into consideration that the number of vessels is so much less, and the number of guns is so much less, you do not then want even the seventy-six hundred, nor anything like it. That is the deduction which I draw from it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from New York. I understood his argument to be that the chairman of the Naval Committee was altogether mistaken in supposing that steam vessels required a larger number of men than sailing vessels, and that his argument was, "here is the Roanoke of the same tonnage, the same number of guns, that requires only about forty men less than the Franklin, which is a steam vessel." I thought when he was making his argument that he understood this vessel that was in the service before the war to be only a sailing vessel, and therefore his deduction was that a steam vessel does not require more men. I will ask him if that was not his argument?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator asks me a question, and by permission of the Senator from Iowa I will answer it. The Senator from Indiana is entirely mistaken in supposing that I was combating the proposition that steam required more men. I was combating the proposition that steam required so many more men as to make it unsafe to adopt this amendment. In other words, I was combating the proposition that the reduced number of guns did not enable us to reduce the force because steam required so many more men. I said that the addition shown to be necessary upon this vessel to manage all her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and take care of her, using that expression, was not enough to make up the difference; that, making allowance for all that could be claimed from those figures, seventy-six hundred men were more than we should need for that number of vessels and that number of guns. That was my argument.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to add simply this: then I was not, when the Senator spoke, nor am I now, able to see the force of the comparison he makes between these two vessels. He certainly did make some use of the fact that upon the one vessel there was only a small number of men required over the other; and if they were both sailing vessels or both steam vessels I do not see the force of the comparison.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very glad to be interrogated by the Senator, and I will endeavor to make him see it precisely. I understood the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to say, in answer to the Senator from Rhode Island, that these large guns were so unwieldy—he did not use that word—that where eight men could manage a gun before twenty-six men, if I caught his figures correctly, were necessary to manage one now. I instituted a comparison between these two vessels, showing that the difference in the number of guns was only one, that between thirty-nine and forty, and yet that this additional number of men, thirty or forty, whatever it may be, was all that was called for to manage all these guns and manage the vessel. That is the purpose for which I introduced it, and that is the purpose for which I insist upon it, to show that the additional force, whatever may occasion it now, I do not care what it may be per gun or per vessel, is enough to exhaust the seventy-six hundred men with the present armament, saying nothing about the additional force.

Mr. GRIMES. I judge that the Senator from New York imagines that one of these vessels has an armament of larger caliber than the other.

Mr. CONKLING. I supposed that to be so from what the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs said. I admitted that. I did not assert it, but I admitted it. If it is not so I have strengthened my argument on that subject.

Mr. GRIMES. The chairman of the Naval Committee did not say so. I never admitted it, and do not admit it now. In reply to the Senator from Rhode Island I stated that a gun on a monitor or on a vessel that could be controlled by an engine beneath it did not require as many men as a gun of small caliber; but I said when you increase the armament upon a vessel where the guns have to be handled by men, by manual labor, you have to increase your men exactly in proportion to the caliber of your gun or the weight of your gun; and that it would take at least twenty-six men to make a gun's crew for one of these fifteen-inch guns. That is what I said; but I never said that the Franklin had guns of a larger caliber than the Roanoke. I did say that our vessels were armed before the war with eight, nine, and eleven inch guns, and they are armed with them now, and we have not got any larger armaments upon our frigates to-day or upon any of our cruisers than we had then. These large guns do not go afloat.

Mr. CONKLING. What makes the increase of men necessary on the Franklin?

Mr. GRIMES. Simply because the Franklin is pierced for a great many more guns than she carries, and they were not put on before, and it was necessary that an additional number of men should be employed upon her in order to perform certain duties upon that portion of her deck that was not covered by her battery. That is the reason that they have some thirty odd men more.

I ought to say a word, Mr. President, not as being drawn out by anything the Senator has said here to-day specially, but on account of what I have seen stated elsewhere, in regard to this Franklin. She is the only large ship that we have now afloat. She is in the European waters and bears the pennant of the only admiral this country ever saw. Festivities have been enjoyed by that gentleman, whose father was a native of one of the islands in the Mediterranean, such as have never been enjoyed by any one else in this country; and greater honors have been bestowed upon him.

Now let me relieve the apprehensions of anybody who may have apprehensions on this subject by saying that not a dollar is spent by Admiral Farragut in any of the festivities in which he participates or that he gives which does not come out of his own pocket, and that ours is the only nation on the face of the globe that has a fleet that does not furnish money to its admirals situated as he is to entertain distinguished people where they cruise. There is no naval officer who goes abroad and maintains the character of the nation in the way that gentlemen suppose it should be maintained who is not obliged to come home bankrupt, or else draw very largely upon his private purse or the purse of his friends.

Mr. President, I say that this is the only large vessel that we have afloat. Our largest squadron is in the Chinese waters. It is composed for the most part of small vessels, and it requires more men, let me tell the Senator from New York, in proportion to the number of guns and the size of the ships, upon a small vessel than it does upon a large one. Anybody can see that, I suppose.

I believe, sir, that I have said all that I desire to say about this letter. It only conveys the same facts that were embodied in the Secretary's letter which I read here to-day to the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I believe I am in my proper place, being last and least upon this Committee on Naval Affairs, in proposing to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes. I propose to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, on the ground that I believe I am acting upon better information than he has been able to furnish us why I should change my vote. I generally look for information to sources that know more about the subject than I know myself. If I desire to find out how many men a ship wants to man her properly as a man-of-war I go to a naval officer, who is presumed to know all about it. If I want to find out how many ships are necessary for us in time of peace I go to those who are best qualified to judge. If I want to know what the cost of that is I go to the fountain head, the Secretary of the Navy, to ascertain, and I do not often consult subalterns. The distinguished Senator from New York, instead of going to the fountain head, goes to the kitchen door and talks with a lieutenant, who knows perhaps as little about the whole arrangement of the Navy as the honorable Senator has shown he does himself. [Laughter.] Were it not that I am confident his ambition would strike higher I should presume, from the course of his argument and the time he has occupied, that he was convincing the world of his peculiar fitness to be Secretary of the Navy, if there should be a change in that Department. [Laughter.]

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate is a man ripe in experience, who has stood at the head of our naval affairs in peace and in war, and who knows every artery, vein, nerve, and ligament that binds the Navy together. He knows what it needs in time of war and in time of peace, and is certainly on record for having as high a regard for economy as the distinguished Senator from New York; and his economy is not spasmodic; it has pervaded him ever since I have had the honor to be a member of the Naval Committee. He has never been spasmodic, but is constant in that respect.

Mr. President, the standard of our Navy was eighty-five hundred men under the administration of Mr. Toucey, Secretary of the Navy, and I shall not be considered as speaking disrespectfully of him when I say that at that time he had no peculiar desire to increase our naval force. Judging from the record and from where our ships were at the time our trouble commenced, I may say that the fewer men we had and the more they were scattered the better it suited him. But, sir, the point I desire to make here is, that eighty-five hundred men—not boys—not, in the peculiar parlance of the Senator from New York, "powder-monkeys," on which he seems to have dwelt with peculiar relish from the time this argument commenced till now—that eighty-five hundred men was the number fixed by law. That is where we propose to keep it now. They had boys in the Navy then, but they were not counted as men. They have boys in the Navy now, and they should not be counted now as men any more than then.

But, sir, the honorable Senator from New York deems it important every time he discusses this question to talk of the apprentice boys. What and who are they, and how much are they to be relied upon? I say, in advance, that the apprentice system is a system which experience will abolish as soon as Congress gets time to investigate it. They are made up in the main of most unreliable boys, boys that are not controllable at home, and who are sent upon these ships more as a place of confinement than from any expectation that they will improve to such an extent that they will be able to be made officers or more efficient seamen than other boys. Among them, I know, is a different class, and I assert that the system, if carried on, will prove the ruin of that class. Poor, honest people in the country, mistaking the object of this apprentice ship, send their boys to it, and they find themselves either inoculated with the follies and vices of the mass that surround them, or in company that makes them discontented, and it is absolutely a confinement instead of a place of improvement to them. Upon this class of persons I should not rely much in the hour of our country's necessity. They are boys. The system is supposed simply to be a nursery, in its broadest sense a nursery, in which seamen are reared to supply the places of the men in the service who become old and drop out. How far it may be beneficial in this respect I do not know; but I would much rather trust to our merchant marine to make seamen for our Navy in the hour of our necessity than to rely upon that system of training that they receive in these apprentice ships. This is a subject upon which I have made a good many inquiries of those who are experienced in its operations.

The honorable Senator from New York is not only discontented and dissatisfied with the number of men we propose to have, but he is dissatisfied with the operation of the Navy generally. He says that he thinks Admiral Farragut's duty would be better performed in some other place than where he is now.

Sir, I agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky that our Navy is and should be our glory. Our naval vessels are our missionaries abroad; and the honorable Senator from New York, when he made use of the expression to which I have just referred, forgot the inspiration that was gathered from our flag when it touched the Italian shore. What nobler service can this country perform than to swing the broad pennant of her first admiral in those waters, and an admiral, Mr. President, who has won the affections not only of this nation but of the world—to show the flag in which we glory on the shores that have been so long longing to be free? He was visited there by persons of no ordinary character. He was visited by that daring leader who has made Romans Romans again; and from that, as he himself describes, he gathered fresh inspiration and will redouble his exertions to light the fires of liberty, of which our flag is emblematic, upon that long down-trodden shore and people.

Sir, it is a noble function of this Government that while our Navy and its flag bespeak our own national glory and power they have that electric, indescribable something which makes whoever sees them pant for our institutions and their glory as much as any other thing could do; and yet the honorable Senator from New York does not think that expense is tolerable. Sir, when the admirals of the French and British navies at the Belize told Farragut that they had been up to New Orleans, and that it was impossible for him to go, that it was one wall of fire, he replied simply that he was ordered up, that was all. There was nothing more that he could say. Now, sir, he has been ordered abroad and he has gone, and I glory in it.

But the Senator from New York talks of economy. Sir, there is a difference between picaune economy and a generous view of things. My friend has spasms of economy. Every time he wants to force a measure of his own over any committee he cries "economy" and talks of taxation. If the admiral of that fleet was half as spasmodical as the Senator is I would not trust him abroad, and the nation would not. [Laughter.] Sir, in my judgment it is in the broadest national sense economy to send such a fleet to foreign ports as their eyes never saw before and can see nowhere else.

The fleet itself is beautiful; it is powerful; it is the perfection of human mechanism; it bespeaks a nation rich in her inventive genius and power, and with a caliber of guns that command respect everywhere. That is not all of the Navy, sir. I want to see her manned with American men. I do not care so much for the beauty of the ship, but the glory of the American Navy is her men; and when we man the yards in a foreign port I want to see none of them go through the lubber-hole, but out over the futtock shrouds, like good sailors, as Americans only can do.

Now, talk of your powder-monkeys and boys of the Navy! We want men, sir, and so would the honorable Senator from New York if it was economical, [laughter;] but as it is not he wants boys' and powder-monkeys to man the yards! Sir, I am down on all such economy. I represent a great deal poorer people than he does, and my people would be ashamed of my economy if I were to take one laurel or one man that was necessary from the American Navy. Such, sir, is the character of our seamen, and such is the desire of the Naval Committee that it shall remain. I assert here that this nation is able to pay the expenses of keeping men in our Navy, not boys. What would the boys have done before Fort Jackson and those other ports and land batteries up the Mississippi? It tried the nerves of the strongest men, and the waters were dyed with their blood; and yet they went on in obedience to Farragut's orders, and they got there. Boys would not have done it, nor powder-monkeys! You want men, strong men, not only men of physical but mental stature, that know the dignity and honor of the country they represent, and bear it with them in their impress wherever they go. That is what we want. Now, away, sir, with your powder-monkeys as an exhibition of American greatness in our Navy! It is nonsense; there is neither economy nor sound statesmanship in it!

Mr. President, I have said all I desired to say on this question. The chairman of our committee is clock and dial. He is Daboll and Pike in figures, and my friend from New York will learn that he had better not strike him in the statistics of the Navy, for he reads them nights and Sunday mornings and knows what they are. [Laughter.]

I hope, sir, that the Senate will vindicate the character of this nation in such way, keeping a close eye upon economy, as is becoming its greatness and its dignity. Eighty-five hundred men is a less naval force than any nation on the earth, with ships of the same number or the same size as ours, maintains.

Sir, I desire to maintain the glory that our Navy has already won for us. From the day that the little Monitor fought the Merrimac this nation has stood supreme in her naval architecture and power; and well exclaimed that noble lord in the British Parliament who said that the English navy was not worth the timber of which it was constructed as compared with ours.

Sir, that monitor was the fruit of American ingenuity; it was born as an American idea. That thing now a stripling, clothed yet literally with the marks of its swaddling clothes around it, I want to build up and perfect in its glory till the nations of the earth shall answer centuries from now that their navies are powerless against the American Navy. As long as we do that we shall maintain our prowess on the sea. And I anticipate the day when no nation will go to war with another without saying "By the permission of your Government; we are afraid of your Navy; we are afraid of your men, not your boys or powder-monkeys, but your men; we have seen you on the field of strife, in the conflict of the seas." Sir, it is American men we want in the Navy, guided by an intelligence that as yet outranks the commander of any other Navy of the earth; and as we go on in this way we shall have not only one Farragut, but scores of them, not only one Porter, but a thousand, if we stand as we ought to stand and keep the dignity of our Navy where it ought to be—the strongest naval Power of the earth.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have not risen with the intention of entering in the discussion of the general subject now before the Senate, but for the purpose of alluding to an intimation which fell from the Senator from Nevada—an allusion to a charge which has frequently been made against one of my constituents, a man whom I believe to be as patriotic as any man living in this country, whatever may have been his political views at a former time. The charge to which the Senator alluded is a charge which has often been made against that distinguished gentleman, that while Secretary of the Navy he scattered, as the Senator said, the Navy in all parts of the world a year before the breaking out of the war, with the design and intention of crippling this Government, so far as that arm of defense was concerned, in anticipation of the civil war. That charge has frequently been made; it has been a common charge in the newspapers; and I have no doubt it is believed by many. At the time when the charge was first made I differed entirely from that gentleman in his opinions and in his course; but I never believed there was the slightest foundation for that idea. In fact, any gentleman looking at it for a single moment would see that it was in itself almost impossible and absurd.

But, sir, it was investigated; there was a committee of investigation upon that or a similar subject, of which the former chairman of the Naval Committee, now our minister at Madrid, [Mr. Hale,] was chairman. Mr. Toucey was summoned to appear before that committee; he did appear; he came from Hartford to Washington and testified before that committee; he was fully examined, and the committee were entirely satisfied that there was no foundation whatever for the charge; that the Navy, so far from having been scattered with any design or intention of weakening the Government, was in point of fact more at home at that time than it had been, and that if any of our vessels had been sent away it was not for the purpose of weakening the Government but for entirely a different purpose, a purpose alluded to by the Senator himself when he said that our Navy ought to be missionaries in foreign countries. In that very expression he vindicated the course of Mr. Toucey with regard to the Navy of this country at that time. They were sent abroad to foreign ports, as they had been.

Mr. HOWARD. Was not Mr. Toucey a member of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet?

Mr. DIXON. He was. I am speaking of him in relation to that point.

Mr. HOWARD. Did he resign his place?

Mr. DIXON. He did not.

Mr. HOWARD. He held it in the fore part of 1861?

Mr. DIXON. He held his position. I am now speaking of the charge against him, renewed here by the Senator from Nevada, that he scattered the Navy with the intention of weakening the Government. I did not wish to go into it; I barely wished to say that at that time, having heard the charge, I believed it unjust. I now believe it unjust, and I think it my duty as representing the State of which he is a distinguished citizen, here to say that there was never any foundation for it; it was a mere political charge, without any foundation whatever, in my judgment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Edmonds, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Sprague, Thayer, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Connors, Crain, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Corbett, Ferry, Fowler, Howe, Morton, Norton, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Vickers, and Yates—13.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the 6th instant, as to the course of practice in respect to the settlement of public accounts and the drawing of requisitions therefor by the Secretary of War; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a communication dated the 6th instant, from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, relative to the necessity of a speedy action of Congress on the estimates of appropriation for the use of the Indian service, heretofore submitted by that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 464, in relation to the qualification of jurors. I do not think it will take any time.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is very important to have an executive session; I have been waiting a day or two.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think this bill will pass without controversy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New York is not debatable. The question is on that motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will not the Senator withdraw it until I get this bill up?

Mr. SHERMAN. A motion to take it up is just as good.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask if a motion to take up a bill does not leave it as the unfinished business?

Several SENATORS. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the Chair to have so ruled, and I want to know what the practice is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the bill come up first.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want that question settled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is not up now. The motion is to go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1868.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition from the members of the grand and traverse juries now sitting in the circuit court at Boston, in which they represent that they are allowed pay at two dollars per day, and they are unable to board for that sum at any first-class hotel in Boston, and they ask that their case may be taken into consideration by Congress and that they may have an additional allowance. I ask the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Fredericktown, Missouri, asking that James Duncan, of that town, be compensated for services rendered during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of Mary Potter, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SCHOOL PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HARLAN. There is lying on the desk a bill of the Senate in relation to the exemption of school-houses in this District from taxation, which has passed the House of Representatives with an amendment, and the Committee on the District of Columbia propose to concur in the amendment with some amendments. I would be glad if the Senate would allow it to be taken up. It will occupy, I think, not more than a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 389) exempting property in the District of Columbia held and used for school purposes from local taxation.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all real and personal property in the District of Columbia now under the school laws of said District, or hereafter to be held by the trustees of colored schools for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and by the board of commissioners of primary schools of Washington county, District of Columbia, in trust for the use of colored schools, shall be, so long as held for that purpose, exempt from local taxation, except such as are authorized by the charter of said cities, and by the law establishing the levy court of the county of Washington for special purposes; and it shall not be lawful for the municipal authorities of either of said cities, or the levy court of the county of Washington, to collect any tax that may have accrued against, or been levied or assessed upon, any such property since said trustees of colored schools or board of commissioners of primary schools, as the case may be, acquired the title or right to occupy or use the same for such purposes, except such taxes as may have accrued, or been levied or assessed, for special purposes as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of such member of the board of trustees of the schools for colored children in the cities aforesaid as now is or shall be, by said board of trustees, from time to time, hereafter designated or selected to act as treasurer thereof, to give separate bonds every year to the municipal authorities of said cities of Washington and Georgetown respectively, with two sureties each, to be approved by the mayors of said cities respectively, in a penal sum to be fixed annually by the mayors of said cities respectively, for the safe-keeping and faithful disbursement of such moneys as shall, from time to time, be paid to said trustees by the municipal authorities of said cities for educational purposes, under and by virtue of the provisions of the eighteenth and nineteenth sections of the act of Congress, approved June 25, 1864, "to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, and for other purposes," and the declaratory act, approved July 23, 1866, "relating to public schools in the District of Columbia."

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for said trustees of the schools for colored children to expend in either of said cities moneys received under the provisions of said acts from the municipal authorities of the other.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommended a concurrence in the amendment of the House with amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section one, line seven, to strike out the word "are" and insert the words "may be;" in line eight to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or;" and in line ten to strike out the words "for special purposes" and to insert "upon property held for the use of other public schools therein;" so that the clause will read:

Shall be, so long as held for that purpose, exempt from local taxation, except such as may be authorized by the charter of said cities, or by the law establishing the levy court of the county of Washington upon property held for the use of other public schools therein.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section one, line eighteen, to strike out the words "for special purposes as aforesaid" and to insert "according to the provisions of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section two, line eight, to strike out the words "mayors of said cities respectively" and to insert "chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended, was concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 598) to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 132) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of H. D. McKinney, reported a bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of H. D. McKinney; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles C. O'Neill, reported a bill (S. No. 477) for the relief of Charles C. O'Neill; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 251) for the relief of Charles N. Goulding, late quartermaster of volunteers, reported it with an amendment.

MOSES F. SHINN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 467.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill at this time.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 467) to confirm an entry of land by Moses F. Shinn was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confirm the entry, by Moses F. Shinn, of the northeast quarter of section sixteen, in township fifteen, north of range thirteen east, in the district of lands subject to sale at Omaha, Nebraska, made on the 22d of August, 1866, by cash certificate No. 1931.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FILING OF RAILROAD REPORTS.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 450, relative to filing reports of railroad companies. It will lead to no debate, and the bill is very necessary to be passed.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 450) relative to filing reports of railroad companies, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the reports required to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 1st of July of each year, by the corporations created by or entitled to subsidies under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof, shall hereafter be made to the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the 1st of October of each year. The reports are to furnish full and specific information upon the several points mentioned in the twentieth section of the act of 1862, and are to be verified as therein prescribed, and on failure to make them as herein required the issue of bonds or patents to the company in default is to be suspended until the requirements of this act shall be complied with by such company, and the reports hitherto made to the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of July 1, 1862, are to be transferred and delivered by him to the Secretary of the Interior, to be filed by him.

The corporations created by the provisions of the acts of Congress, approved July 2, 1864, and July 27, 1866, and known as the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, are to make reports to the Secretary of the Interior on or before the 1st of October of each year, as are thus required to be made by the Union Pacific railroad and branches, and on failure so to do are to be subject to the like suspension.

The reports required from the commissioners appointed to examine and report in relation to the road of any of the corporations whereto reference is made in this act, are to be addressed to and filed in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the bill in section three, line five, by inserting after the words "Department of the Interior" the words "and all such reports heretofore made shall be transferred to and filed in said Department of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, as this bill relates to filing certain reports or something of that sort, whether we are going to get into the same scrape that we did with regard to the other matter that is now under debate, whether we are going to complicate ourselves with other companies, and lay the foundation of a claim of two or three millions on the Government, because we have broken faith, &c.?

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator would read the bill he would see at once that no such danger is to be incurred.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not know. I did not understand it at all.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to say a word. This bill simply requires the reports that are to be filed by these railroad companies to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior instead of being filed as they now are, some of them, in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not extend the time, or give any new privileges, or anything of that sort?

Mr. HOWARD. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If no danger of that sort is incurred I have nothing to say about it.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his exceeding care on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really did not know what the effect of it was.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan one question, if he will allow me. What is the point of the amendment dispensing with filing reports with the Secretary of the Treasury? There is no doubt some object in it. Will the Senator be kind enough to state it?

Mr. HOWARD. The object of the bill is simply this: to require all the reports from the various railroad companies which are receiving subsidies; either in land or bonds, from the United States to be filed in the Department of the Interior, for the sake of uniformity and convenience. That is all. Some of them are now filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, and some with the Secretary of the Interior, thus producing confusion.

Mr. CONKLING. The whole object, then, is to make them of record all in one place?

Mr. HOWARD. All in one place. That is the sole object of the bill.

DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 307, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I shall object this time. My friend has had one bill considered this morning, and I am very anxious to take up one myself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will it take long?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think not; but it is one that it is very important to pass.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill that I have moved to take up, I will say to the Senator, has been taken up once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection, only as to time. I think my friend has had his share this morning. I do not like to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection carries it over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object; but I ask him to give way to me.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a bill on the table, which was reported some time ago from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with reference to the new jail for the District. It is a House bill, and has been reported back to the Senate with some amendments. I think it will take no time, and it is important to pass it, from the fact that it is getting late in the season, and if the work is to be begun this year the bill ought to be passed very soon. I move to take up that bill. It is House bill No. 784, to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia," approved July 25, 1866.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be taken up at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So I understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

ONE TERM FOR PRESIDENT.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 133) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that the amendment proposed be read for information.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

No person elected President or Vice President who has once served as President shall afterward be eligible to either office.

Mr. SUMNER. I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 3d of February last, information in relation to existing laws regulating the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of Saint Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 464, in regard to the selection of jurors in United States courts. I called it up last evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. Is there any objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] wishes to be here when that bill is taken up; and I do not see him in his seat.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He was here a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking up the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have none.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a bill reported from the Judiciary Committee in regard to the qualification of jurors. I hope it will be taken up. The Senator from Indiana will probably be in a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 464) in relation to the qualifications of jurors. It provides that no person shall be held incompetent to act as a juror upon any grand jury by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matters to be submitted to such grand jury for investigation, founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or the common history of the times, provided he be otherwise competent, and upon his oath declare, and it appear to the satisfaction of the court that, notwithstanding such opinion, he can and will act impartially upon the matters to be submitted, and true presentment make according to the evidence; but the court may, in its discretion, set aside any such person. In trials for public offenses against the United States no person is to be held to be incompetent to act as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or the common history of the times, provided he be otherwise competent, and upon his oath declare, and it appear to the satisfaction of the court that, notwithstanding such opinion, he can and will impartially try the accused upon the crime charged in the indictment, and a true verdict give upon the evidence to be produced upon the trial; but the court may, in its discretion, set aside any such juror.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that that bill meets with the approbation of the Senator from Indiana. My recollection is that it was approved by all the other members of the committee. I say I am not sure he approves of it, because he told me yesterday, if I understood him correctly, that he desired to speak to the bill when it was called up again. I suggest, therefore, to the chairman that he had better let it be laid aside informally until that Senator is in the Chamber.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will probably be in a moment; and in the mean time I will suggest a slight amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say, not wishing to speak again on the subject, that my opinion is the bill does not change the law at all, but there are various opinions upon the subject throughout the United States, in the courts of the United States and the State courts. Some of them think the formation of an opinion of itself is sufficient to exclude a juror; others that it must be not only the forming but the expressing of an opinion; while others think that neither forming nor expressing an opinion, if it be formed upon the grounds stated in this bill, ought to exclude. I think in the case of the United States vs. Burr, tried before Mr. Chief Justice Marshall and his associate, they ruled that the formation and expression of an opinion would exclude; but that is not, I am sure, the judgment of very many of the courts of the United States at the present time; and I am not certain that it is now the ruling in England. It will be at once seen that in all cases that produce a strong impression upon the public mind the newspapers of the day state their understanding of the facts, and are calculated to form the opinion of the public. It is very difficult, therefore, in a case of that description, to find a person who has not formed some opinion, either upon the law or the facts; and that is especially the case in relation to all political offenses. But if a man is known by the court to be an honest man—and this is left to the judgment of the court—we must trust the court if he is known or believed to be an honest man, and he swears, notwithstanding the then impression, that he feels that he will be able to render a fair verdict, and the court so think from the character of the man and the manner in which he states his belief in his power to decide impartially, I do not see why he should not be permitted to be a juror.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senator from Maryland is probably correct in his view that the better rule is that which this bill prescribes, and that it is already the law. I am quite sure it is held so to be in many of the States; but there is some contrariety of opinion on the subject, and it was thought better to have an act which would make the practice uniform. I desire to suggest a slight amendment. In section two, line two, I move to strike out the word "public" before the word "offenses;" so that it will read: "In trial for offenses against the United States." It does not change the meaning at all; but I think the word "public" had better be left out. It is a mere verbal alteration.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In line ten of the same section, after the word "indictment," I move to insert the words "or information;" so that it will read: "Upon the crime charged in the indictment or information and a true verdict give."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. BAYARD. I have never examined this measure before, but it seems to me that this bill is hardly necessary upon any construction that I can conceive, and I think it is dangerous in its principles. I believe the principle to be sound and true that a man who has formed and expressed an opinion for or against an accused person ought not to sit as a juror in the trial of his cause. It matters not as to the reasons upon which that opinion has been formed and expressed. The real reason why a man is held not to be impartial and fit to act as a juror in a particular case after having formed and expressed an opinion in that case—the mere forming of an opinion is not sufficient—is that from the pride of human opinion men would necessarily be biased in their action in the case; and the object is to secure entire impartiality. Are you to waive that in particular cases, cases where it may be there is a difficulty in the selection of a jury? Compare the difference of the two principles. The impartiality of the juror in the case is an essential principle of justice. In a few individual instances it may be that forming and expressing an opinion may exclude a great number of persons and create difficulty in obtaining a jury for the trial of the accused; but in no case can it entirely prevent such a trial, because there is the right of change of venue.

I submit, therefore, without further time to look into the questions connected with it, that this is a dangerous innovation upon the settled principle of law founded on the necessity of the impartial action of justice in reference to persons accused of crime. The reasons given for making an exception of persons who have formed their opinion founded upon public rumor, statements of public journals, or common history cannot avoid the effect of the rule itself, because it matters not what may be the reasons or grounds on which a man has formed and expressed an opinion. The basis which rejects him on the ground of want of impartiality is the pride of human opinion founded on an expressed opinion. I think, therefore, that the bill ought not to pass. With regard to grand juries it would make very little difference. In the case of a petit jury, where it may affect the liberty or life of the accused, I think the innovation upon the general principle of law unsound.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Illinois what those amendments were? I was not in the Chamber at the time they were made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Striking out in the second line of the second section the word "public" before the word "offenses," and in the tenth line inserting the words "or information" after the word "indictment." The first is merely a verbal amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire what the private conversation is that is going on between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is of very little consequence.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In reply to the Senator from Missouri I will say that the conversation in no way affects the honor of Missouri.

Mr. DRAKE. But perhaps it may refer to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had the honor to inquire of the Senator from Illinois, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, what the amendments made in Committee of the Whole were. I made this inquiry because I was a member of the same committee with him, and desired to know in what respect the bill was changed.

Mr. DRAKE. I merely wished to know if it referred to the bill before the Senate. I should like to have the pleasure of hearing the conversation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, that the Senator from Missouri may know exactly what the conversation was, which, unquestionably as a member of this body is his constitutional right, I will say that the Senator from Illinois explains that in the second line of the second section the word "public" is stricken out before the word "offenses," and in the tenth line after the word "indictment" the words "or information" are inserted. That is the extent of the information communicated to me by the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. I am much obliged to the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I confess myself unfriendly to this bill. Of all the rights that are secured by human government I believe the right of trial by an impartial jury to be the most important. Indeed, I do not think that any system of government could possibly be devised, even by the honorable and able Senator from Illinois, who has stood at the head of the Committee on the Judiciary for so many years, that would be worth preserving if it dispensed with the right of trial by an impartial jury in criminal cases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would not do that.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not certain that the honorable Senator's measure is not the initiation of such an innovation. It is certainly a change upon the right to the trial by jury as defined by Chief Justice Marshall in his opinions in the case of Burr. I agree with the honorable Senator from Delaware, that not only the safety, but the glory of the trial by jury is to have impartial jurymen. I do not believe that it is within the scope of human nature to be an impartial juror in any case in which an opinion has been formed and expressed, whether upon rumor, upon newspaper publications, or history, or having heard the evidence in some other way in advance. The honorable Senator from Delaware has well said that from the infirmity of human nature there is an inherent pride of opinion, of consistency of opinion, of firmness in adhering to an opinion; and where ever that state of mind exists, whether it has been produced by rumor, or public history, or the hearing of evidence on oath, in my judgment and according to my experience, it is an insuperable barrier against the requisition of impartiality in a juror. I have had some little experience in the trial of criminal cases, and, to the best of my recollection, in all the thousands of jurors that I have heard examined on their voir dire to ascertain whether they were impartial and competent jurors I never have known of a solitary instance in which a man has formed or expressed his opinion of the guilt or innocence of the accused, from whatever sources or character of information he formed that opinion, upon that he was an impartial juror in the case.

Sir, if the question was put to me to-day, will you yield the right of trial by jury or the whole Government besides, I would sooner yield the whole Government besides than that single and most inestimable right of the citizen. The commendations of the importance and the value of that right and its indispensable necessity to a free government and a free people that have been given to it by Montesquieu and Blackstone and other enlightened writers throughout the world I fully accord with.

Now, Mr. President, here certainly is an innovation upon the right of trial by jury. If the bill makes no alteration in the law of juries, there is no necessity for it. We cannot presume that as able and as learned a lawyer as is the Senator from Illinois would propose a law changing the right of trial by jury in some feature that did not effect a material change. I concede that this proposed measure does, if it becomes a law, effect a material change. The one indispensable test which ought never to be yielded by any law or by any system of law in the qualification of a juror is that he should be strictly impartial; that he should come to the trial of the case with an unformed opinion. His mind should be as pure as a blank white piece of paper, and should have nothing written upon it, either of conviction or opinion against the accused, from whatever sources of information upon which that opinion might be formed. Gentlemen may laugh and they may snigger; but their scoffs and their jibes will not drive me from my opposition to this innovation. I do not care what their age or their standing for legal ability or their position in society may be. That is not the way to meet an objection to an important measure like this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator does not understand me as doing anything of that sort?

Mr. DAVIS. No; nor do I care.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I supposed not; but then the Senator was remarking—

Mr. DAVIS. I was remarking upon the scene that was going on in front of me.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member certainly did not mean to say that I was scoffing or sneering at his argument.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know whether you were or not, and I am indifferent as to that. Sir, I make the objection which I have made in all seriousness.

But there is another and the principal objection which I make to this measure of legislation. When you once commence innovations upon the right of trial by jury no man can set limits to the extent to which those innovations may go. The only way to preserve the right of trial by jury sacred and inviolate is to permit no innovations upon it. I did not intend to say as much as I have said. I simply intended to utter my protest against the bill and to record my vote against it, and, having done that, I am satisfied.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not suppose that any Senator here would be disposed to injure or impair the great right of trial by jury or to change it. The object of this bill is not to change the right of trial by jury in any manner; it is to preserve it unchanged. All lawyers know that the jury originally must always come from the locality, from the vicinage, perhaps because they were thought to know something of the subject. In our day, when everybody reads newspapers, if we want to have an intelligent jury it will not answer to exclude those that read an account of the affair or transaction to be investigated; and no intelligent man can read a newspaper account without forming at least a hypothetical opinion; and if he has formed it he may express it, and yet in no manner be disqualified from being a juror. The object of this bill is to correct the injurious rulings of some of our courts. There is no State in the Union where the old common law is preserved with as much purity and as little affected by statute as the State of New Jersey, and in that State the amount and purport of this statute have uniformly been ruled by the courts as a part of the common law. I will simply read the heading of an important case in that State, which states the true principle which this statute is intended to preserve:

"It is no ground of principal challenge to a juror that he has expressed an opinion on the matter to be tried, if it was not done through ill-will or malice."

If done through ill-will or malice he would be excluded; but it is no ground of principal challenge.

"A juror cannot be asked whether he has expressed an opinion on the issue. A hypothetical opinion formed by a juror from facts which he has heard is no cause of challenge."

Therefore, instead of this bill being intended to change the common law or to impair in any way the right of trial by jury, it is to preserve the common law and to secure intelligent and impartial jurors.

Mr. BAYARD. The decision cited by the honorable Senator from New Jersey carries the common-law principle further than I supposed it to exist; and it seems to me that the very ground that is stated there of exception, that a man shall not be rejected for having formed an opinion unless he did it from malice or ill-will, is one reason why this bill ought not to pass. The individual who from ill-will or malice has formed an opinion is most likely to take the oath required by the law for the purpose of enabling him to sit in the cause. That is human nature. Nor do I concede that the proper mode of reasoning for correcting the supposed diversities of opinion that exist among courts is by legislation of this kind. I suppose a case might in some way be brought before the ultimate tribunal that would settle that principle soundly for all cases; for it ought to be the same in all cases, surely. Nor do I concede that the objection I have stated is answered by the honorable Senator from New Jersey; the decision does not notice it; and that is, that the principle of law is that the juror should be omni exceptione major. The object is impartiality, freedom from that bias which will not suffer the mind to give a fair verdict. Now, sir, when there is a formed and expressed opinion, it matters not on what grounds that opinion has been formed, beyond all question the pride of human opinion will prevent the juror from being impartial in the case. It gives him a bias. Gentlemen have but to bring it home to themselves. Suppose they stood in the attitude of an individual accused of crime and on trial. Would they feel that a fair verdict could be rendered by a man who on rumor or newspaper reading, if you please, had formed and expressed an opinion as to their guilt or innocence? They might desire that a man who had expressed an opinion of their innocence should be on the trial; but that would be objectionable on the other side. But if the opinion of guilt had been expressed, certainly no man would feel that he had a fair trial if the individual who had expressed that opinion was to sit as a juror on his trial.

Sir, I am told that men will form hypothetical opinions. That is not the language of the law. Hypothetical opinions are very different from those opinions the law contemplates as ground of exclusion. Nor do I think that any practical inconvenience can arise from the fact that men will read newspapers and form some kind of impression, and even state that impression which arises in their minds from reading newspapers, on the supposition that the facts there stated are true. That is not in law what is called forming and expressing an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the party; and the case comes more strongly and is better understood after the word "hypothetically" which the honorable Senator from New Jersey introduced in the course of his remarks.

For my own part, I trust this bill will not pass. I think it a dangerous innovation. I think it an innovation upon the true principle of the common law; that a formed and expressed opinion, which is a fixed opinion, ought to incapacitate a party from sitting as a juror in a trial; and any inconvenience in obtaining a jury in individual cases does not compare at all with the propriety of securing to an accused person a fair and impartial trial.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BAYARD and Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Davis, Dixon, Hendricks, McCreery, Morton, Saulsbury, and Wade—8.
ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Morrill of Maine, Ross, Sherman, and Vickers—9.

So the bill was passed.

GEORGE E. GLENN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, by the order of the Senate private bills are now in order.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 168.

Mr. POMEROY. With the leave of the Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to take up a resolution that lies on the table calling for some information. It is a resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] which was passed and subsequently reconsidered and returned here. I merely want to amend the resolution, and then it may either go to a committee or be passed. It is a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for some information in regard to the expenses of the War Department.

Mr. HOWE. I am told that that resolution will lead to debate.

Mr. POMEROY. I merely wish to move an amendment to it, and then, if it leads to debate, I will not ask its further consideration.

Mr. HOWE. I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Kansas, and I would if any one felt any more interest in these claims than I do; but that is not the case.

Mr. POMEROY. It will require no time except that which may be consumed in the reading of the resolution and the reading of the amendment which I propose to submit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution. Is there any objection?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; I think I must object under the circumstances. I am very sorry to do it.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator may not be aware that unless this resolution is considered to-day it will have to lie over for some time, until after the conclusion of the impeachment trial.

Mr. HOWE. Senators all around me say that if I give way to one they want me to show them the same favor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be considered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, to take up Senate bill No. 168.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 168) for the relief of George E. Glenn, additional paymaster United States Army. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Government, in the settlement of the accounts of George E. Glenn, additional paymaster United States Army, to allow a credit of $25,456 80, being the amount of Government money stolen from him by men of company B, second battalion, fourteenth United States infantry, while at Fort Boise, Idaho Territory, in the discharge of his official duties.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims reported that bill adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES HOOPER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 436.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of James Hooper was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James Hooper the sum of $16,000, being the value of his vessel, the bark General Berry, which was captured and destroyed at sea, on the 9th of July, 1864, while in the military service of the United States, by the rebel steamer Florida.

Mr. GRIMES. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

The CHIEF CLERK. There is.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Claims, on the 13th of March last:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and proofs of James Hooper, for compensation for the loss of the bark General Berry, burnt by the rebel steamer Florida, July 9, 1864, between New York and Fortress Monroe, makes the following report:

Captain S. L. Brown, assistant quartermaster United States Army, on duty in New York city, advertised for proposals for freighting forage, and on the 28th of June, 1864, accepted the offer of claimant; and on the 6th of July, 1864, dispatched the bark General Berry to C. D. Webster, acting assistant quartermaster at Fortress Monroe.

The acceptance of the offer of claimant was qualified thus: "No guarantee to unload at Fort Monroe; may be sent up the James river, but not to any other port or place to discharge;" and the bill of lading or contract was indorsed thus: "The war risk to be assumed by the Government if sent up the river to be discharged."

The act of March 3, 1849, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," provides for the payment of damages sustained by the destruction by an enemy of horses, mules, boats, &c., while such property was in the military service of the United States either by impressment or contract; provided such property was destroyed without any fault of the owner while it was actually employed by the United States. By the fifth section of the act of March 3, 1863, the provisions of the foregoing act are extended to steamboats and other vessels.

The bark in question was valued at American Lloyd's (S. L. Taylor, secretary) on the 29th of June, 1864, at $16,000.

The Third Auditor of the Treasury, while reporting that this claim is meritorious, and that it justly appeals to Congress for relief, refused to allow the claim.

1. Because he considered the claimant to be a common carrier.

If a railroad company or other common carrier should undertake, in the course of business, to carry property for the United States, and the train or vessel should be destroyed by an enemy, the train or vessel could not properly be considered as in the military service of the United States, and the common carrier would not be entitled to compensation for the damage sustained.

But the claimant was not acting as a common carrier. The Government made a contract, at a sum per ton named, to occupy the whole vessel, and none of the incidents attaching to a common carrier, or one who undertakes for hire to transport the goods of such as choose to employ him from place to place, are found in this case.

The bark was in the military service of the United States by contract, and while thus employed was, without the fault of the claimant, destroyed by the enemy. Since the loss of the vessel the bill of lading has been indorsed by the assistant quartermaster thus:

"At the time this bill of lading was signed there was supposed to be no war risk between here and Fort Monroe; consequently no application had been made to the Quartermaster General to assume the war risk on vessels carrying freight for the Government by the undersigned. The note that war risk was to be assumed if sent up the river to be discharged was not designed to bar the owner for claiming reimbursement for her loss."

The Quartermaster General also writes to Mr. Hooper thus:

"I hereby certify that on the 27th day of June, 1864, the whole of the bark General Berry was offered to the quartermaster's department for employment, and that on the 28th of June, 1864, the whole capacity of said vessel was accepted by me to load forage for Fort Monroe, and that I furnished said vessel a full cargo of forage under and on deck for account of the United States Government, and had the same covered with plank, at the expense of the United States, to protect her cargo.

"After having accepted the whole of said vessel she was then in the military service of the United States by contract and subject to my order and control. I further certify that neither the master, owner, nor agent of the General Berry assumed, either directly or indirectly, in writing or verbally, the war risk on any portion of her voyage to Fort Monroe; but, on the contrary, I considered the vessel at the risk of the Government, if destroyed by the enemy while in the service of the United States."

The claimant does not hold the position of a common carrier. His vessel was in the military service of the United States by contract, and, under the authority of the statute aforesaid, being destroyed by an enemy, the claimant is entitled to be compensated for the loss.

The Third Auditor refused to allow the claim also on the ground that the bill of lading was indorsed, "The war risk to be assumed by the Government if sent up the river to be discharged."

It is insisted by the Auditor that, on the principles of law that "the including of one is the excluding of the other," this provision raises the implication that the war risk is not assumed by the Government excepting in the event of the bark going up the river.

The evidence shows that the claimant objected to signing this indorsement, and was told by the clerk of the quartermaster who attended to the business that it was not considered that there was any war risk between New York and Fort Monroe, no vessel having, at that time, been captured or destroyed by the enemy between those points. And the claimant was furthermore told that, should the vessel be destroyed, the Government would make it all right; and thereupon the claimant, by his agent, signed the indorsement.

And it further appears that after the destruction of this bark between New York and Fort Monroe by the Florida the Government uniformly assumed the war risk between those points.

Under these circumstances, as the provisions of the statute referred to would have entitled the claimant to compensation for the loss of his vessel but for the indorsement on the bill of lading, he should not, for that reason, be debarred from compensation. Such was not the intention of the indorsement, as the facts show. Besides, it is very clear the understanding was, that in case the vessel was captured the Government would make it "all right;" and the claimant, for that reason, did not have the vessel insured.

The committee have, therefore, come to the conclusion that Congress ought to reimburse the claimant for the value of the vessel, and for that purpose recommend the passage of a bill for the sum of $16,000, the value of the vessel at the time of the departure from the port of New York.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PARKER QUINCE.

Mr. HOWE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 452.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 452) for the relief of Parker Quince was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the sum of $1,608 97 to Parker Quince in the settlement of his accounts with the Government, for his salary as collector of customs for the port of Wilmington, North Carolina, and acting collector of internal revenue from September 13, 1865, to May 14, 1866, in addition to the sums already paid him for salary for that period.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know something about that case. If there is a report accompanying the bill let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Howe, from the Committee on Claims, on the 20th of March:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the papers and petition of Parker Quince, have examined the same and submit the following report:

The petitioner held the office of collector of customs for the port of Wilmington, in North Carolina, from September 13, 1865, to May 14, 1866. During the same period, by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, he acted as collector of internal revenue, and collected in the latter capacity the sum of $20,335 74.

His fees and commissions for this service amounted to $3,148 35. But of this sum he was paid only the sum of $2,244 09, because the law prohibits the payment of two salaries to the same person at the same time.

The petitioner now asks the remainder of the compensation to which he would have been entitled if he had held the office of collector of internal revenue, and could have legally drawn the salaries of both offices.

The committee cannot recommend such an appropriation without disregarding existing laws. But they deem it just to allow him the compensation of the highest office, deducting the salary already received.

He has received for expenses—
As collector of internal revenue.....$2,244 09
As collector of customs.....1,295 29

Total.....$3,539 38

Deducting this total from the amount he would have earned as collector of internal revenue and the balance is $1,608 97, for which sum the committee report the following bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. KIMBALL.

Mr. HOWE. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 50.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 50) for the relief of William H. Kimball, which proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cause to be paid to William H. Kimball, late regimental quartermaster of the eleventh regiment of Minnesota volunteers, the full pay and emoluments of first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of infantry from the 10th of October, 1862, to the 8th of May, 1863.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims reported that bill adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

GOLDSMITH BROTHERS.

Mr. HOWE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 151.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 151) for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the cities of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and pay to Goldsmith Brothers, of the cities of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers, two seven-thirty United States Treasury notes for the payment of $5,000 each, in lieu of two United States seven-thirty Treasury notes of the value of $5,000 each, dated June 15, 1865, and respectively signed by the Treasurer, and numbered three hundred and sixty-four and three hundred and sixty-five, issued under an act of Congress passed March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," which notes were lost or destroyed by the wreck of the steamer Brother Jonathan, off the port of Crescent City, on the 31st of July, 1865; but they are to execute a bond, with sufficient sureties, in the penal sum of $20,000, to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury, indemnifying the United States against any loss on account of the issuing of the bills.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment to the bill, to strike out the word "bills" at the end of the bill and to insert the word "bonds."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLE. I move to amend the bill in the eighteenth line by striking out the word "execute," where it speaks of the bond, and inserting in place of it the word "file," for the reason that I understand the bond is already here, and it will result in unnecessary delay to require of them the execution of another bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

WILLIAM HENRY OTIS.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 279, for the relief of William Henry Otis.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Claims reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the Treasurer of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to W. Henry Otis, of Indianapolis, Indiana, the sum of $20,820 out of any money heretofore or hereafter appropriated and applicable to the payment of claims against the quartermaster's bureau, in full discharge of all claim of the said W. Henry Otis, for damages to face of property occupied from 1861 to 1866 as Camp Burnside, near Indianapolis, Indiana, and for destruction of apple and pear trees and wheat and oat fields, and for total destruction of seven thousand fence rails, five hundred and twenty apple trees, and forty pear trees, during the continuance of the occupancy by the United States authorities of the premises known as the said Camp Burnside.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, or cause to be paid, to William Henry Otis, of Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, the sum of $3,000, in full consideration for growing crop, fencing, and fruit trees destroyed upon and damages done by the United States troops in and to forty-five and a half acres of land belonging to the said William Henry Otis, known as Camp Burnside, lying and being adjacent to the said city of Indianapolis, while said land was occupied by said troops from the year 1861 to the year 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear the report in that case. I am satisfied, if the case is as the bill seems to present it, there will be a great many such claims. I know of a great many in my State.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, on the 21st of March last:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 279, for the relief of William Henry Otis, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

At the commencement of the late war Mr. Otis was the owner (and still is) of a lot of land adjoining the corporate limits of the city of Indianapolis, containing forty-five and a half acres. Of this lot of land the United States military authorities took possession in June, 1861, as a military camp and drill-ground. It was called "Camp Burnside." This possession continued until the year 1866, the latter part of the time for hospital purposes. For the use of said lot of land during the time aforesaid Mr. Otis acknowledges that he received as rent from the United States Government the sum of $4,951 81. But the quartermaster's department refused to pay for damages done by the military forces to said premises, because "the Quartermaster General had no appropriations for the payment of such claims." Thereupon Mr. Otis comes to Congress and asks relief. He presents his claims as follows:

To seven thousand fence rails in fence, at the rate of six dollars per hundred.....	$420
Leveling ground, filling up ditches, sink-holes, and removing embankments, as per lowest bid (see proposals).....	900
Damage to ground for agricultural purposes from June, 1861, to 1866, by grading, graveling embankments, ditches, and sink-holes, on grounds known as "Camp Burnside," near Indianapolis, including the apple crops and pear crops—the production of five hundred and twenty apple trees and forty pear trees—during said years; also, thirty acres of wheat in the field, and five acres of oats in field when occupancy commenced, totally destroyed.....	6,000
Five hundred and twenty apple trees totally destroyed, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per tree.....	12,500
Forty pear trees, totally destroyed, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per tree.....	1,000
	$20,820

A great amount of evidence was presented to the committee in support of this claim. The following is a synopsis of it:

I.—As to fence rails.

The claimant himself swears: "There were about seven thousand fence rails destroyed by the army. Said rails are worth six dollars per hundred in the fence."
Livingston D. Johnson swears: "Fence around the entire premises was destroyed. Have examined the premises and have estimated the fence at about three hundred and twenty rails. It would take about six thousand four hundred rails; rails cannot be had for less than six dollars per hundred."

James G. Featherston testifies: "I have examined the premises and have estimated the fence. I think there were near seven thousand rails destroyed by the army. I estimate rails at the time these rails were destroyed at four dollars per hundred."

John B. Sullivan testifies: "I know the fence was destroyed. I cannot state the number of rods of fence."

William D. Johnson testifies: "Fence totally destroyed; calculated the fence; about six thousand four hundred rails, worth six dollars per hundred."

Recapitulation.

Claimant.....	7,000
Livingston D. Johnson.....	6,400
James G. Featherston.....	7,000
Averaged.....	6,800

which, at six dollars per hundred, makes $408.

II.—In reference to leveling the ground.

The evidence shows that the surface of the ground was much broken by ditches, made by embankments thrown up, sink-holes, collars, &c., dug by the troops. To render the land tillable again it will be necessary to have these embankments leveled, the ditches and sink-holes, &c., filled up. To have this done Mr. Otis published proposals. In response he received the following proposals: By B. F. Johnson, $900; by Johnson Carran, $960; by O'Connor & Smith, $990; by John E. Saunders, $1,000.

III.—General damages done unfitting the land for agricultural purposes.

Livingston D. Johnson: "The land was greatly damaged and rendered unfit for agricultural purposes. It would be impossible to put the land in as good condition as it was before occupancy. I consider the land for agricultural purposes almost a total loss. I would consider the damage to the land for agricultural purposes at about six thousand dollars."

James G. Featherston testifies: "The land was greatly damaged for agricultural purposes by tramping upon it, digging pits, sinks, sidewalks, and graveling and grading over it. For agricultural purposes the soil is almost totally lost."

I estimate the damage to the soil for agricultural purposes at about five thousand dollars."

John B. Sullivan testifies:

"The land was greatly damaged and rendered unfit for agricultural purposes. It would require a great outlay of time and money to render the land of any value for agricultural purposes."

William D. Johnson testifies:

"The land was greatly damaged, and, in my judgment, rendered unfit for agricultural purposes—damaged at least $5,000."

A. Harrison testifies:

"There were streets laid out, gravel put on them, ditches were dug, and the ground was greatly changed from its former condition. The various buildings, digging, and the usual deposit of offal, &c., occasioned great damage to the property."

IV.—Destruction of fruit trees.

Claimant swears:

"Not less than five hundred and sixty pear and apple trees; all good fruit-bearing trees; selection made with great care; extra selection. The orchard, with all the trees, was a total loss. Value said trees at not less than twenty-five dollars per tree."

Livingston D. Johnson testifies:

"Large orchard, numbering at least four hundred healthy, bearing trees; selected with great care; fine selection of trees; all, or nearly all, killed; few that still remain in a dying condition; annual yield of fruit in this orchard was more than ordinary; I consider the orchard a total loss; I have considerable experience in working, cultivating, and growing apple trees, and from my own personal knowledge of the orchard of W. Henry Otis I would value the orchard at not less than twenty-five dollars per tree."

James G. Featherston testifies:

"Large orchard, numbering near five hundred healthy, bearing trees; fine selection of trees, and was a choice variety of fruit; nearly all killed; the few that manifest any signs of life will eventually die; I consider the orchard an entire loss; would value the orchard at not less than twenty-five dollars per tree."

John B. Sullivan testifies:

"Fine orchard; extra fine selection; cannot state the number of trees; I know the trees are all dead; I consider the entire orchard as a total loss; there may be some signs of life in some of the trees, but they will all die; consider the trees worth twenty dollars each."

William D. Johnson testifies:

"Large orchard on the premises; the number of trees I never counted; would estimate the number from three to four hundred fine, healthy apple and pear trees; selection made with great care; extra selection of trees; orchard, with all the trees, I consider a total loss; annual yield usually larger than common; value the orchard at not less than twenty dollars per tree."

A. Harrison certifies:

"Valuable and full bearing orchard was thrown open and, of course, destroyed."

W. H. Loomis certifies:

"The valuable orchard, consisting of five hundred trees, is now entirely destroyed. My estimate of their value alone, were the premises my own, would not be less than fifty dollars per tree. I am satisfied their annual yield, over expense of cultivation, would exceed twenty-five per cent. on that investment."

Recapitulation.

Say fruit trees, five hundred—
Loomis's estimate per tree.....	$50
W. D. Johnson's estimate per tree.....	20
Sullivan's estimate per tree.....	20
Featherston's estimate per tree.....	25
Livingston D. Johnson's estimate per tree.....	25
Making the average estimate per tree $28; and, of course, the total value of trees destroyed is, therefore, $14,000.

V.—Evidence of a general character.

Assessed value of the land for years 1861-62-63 was.....	$8,325
Assessed value for 1864-65-66.....	12,510
The taxes paid on said land by said claimant for the years 1861-62-63-64-65-66 amounted to the sum of $944 24.

Estimated value of said land.

	Per acre.
By John W. Murphey.....	$1,500
By E. B. Martindale.....	1,500
By S. H. Fletcher.....	1,000
By A. L. Roache.....	1,000
By W. H. Morrison.....	1,000
By T. A. Morris.....	1,000
By — Ekin.....	1,000
By A. & J. A. Harrison.....	1,000
By L. D. Johnson.....	1,500
By S. R. Martin.....	1,000
By W. D. Johnson (oath).....	1,200

The average of these estimates makes $1,154 54 per acre; or, $52,531 57 for the entire lot.

One witness, W. H. Loomis, (fruit grower,) certifies in general terms: "When I first knew this tract of ground (namely, 1860) it was a fine garden and orchard enclosure, and if properly cultivated it would readily yield interest on $1,000 per acre."

The committee think that the claimant is entitled to compensation for his fencing which was destroyed. They also are of the opinion that a reasonable allowance should be made to him to pay for the leveling and grading of his lot of land, and that a fair price should be paid to him for his fruit trees that were destroyed; but they think that his alleged claim for damages done to his land, unfitting it for agricultural purposes, is merely speculative, and should not be entertained. They also regard the claimant's estimate of the value of his fruit trees destroyed, as well as the estimated value thereof by the witnesses hereinbefore cited, as very extravagant. If the committee were to be guided in their conclusions by these ex parte estimates, the result would be about as follows:

For fencing destroyed.....	$408
For leveling and grading.....	900
For fruit trees destroyed.....	14,000
	$15,308

This amount for fencing destroyed is, probably, about correct. The committee cannot see, from the evidence in the cases to the character of the ditches, sinks, &c., made on the premises, how it would cost $900 to level and grade the lot so as to fill up these ditches, sinks, &c.; and as to the item of $14,000 for apple trees destroyed, although sustained by the ex parte testimony in the case, they regard it as utterly extravagant. They have been informed that one acre of ground is sufficient to contain thirty-six apple trees, which, at the average estimate of the witnesses, to wit, twenty-eight dollars per tree, would amount to $1,008; and yet the land, fruit trees and all, was not, perhaps, worth more than $1,000 per acre.

On consideration of the whole case as presented to the committee, they are of the opinion that the claimant is justly entitled to, at least, the sum of $5,000, and they accordingly report a substitute for the bill to them referred as aforesaid, and recommend its passage.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask what the sum total of the claim is?

Mr. HOWE. Twenty thousand eight hundred and twenty dollars.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought it was $52,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. What do you allow?

Mr. HOWE. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. WILLEY. The amount of the claim is $20,820. The first page of the report shows it.

The Chief Clerk read from the report, as follows:

"The average of these estimates makes $1,154 54 per acre; or $52,531 57 for the entire lot."

Mr. HOWE. That is the value of the property.

Mr. WILSON. This appears to be a claim for damages to a lot of land on which taxes were paid at a valuation of $8,000; and probably that is a fair approximate of what the whole land was worth. Probably it will sell for more now than it would when it was occupied, as it is close to a growing city. Sir, I regard this bill as one of that class of bills that are to be trumped up against this Government, and if we commenced paying them the sooner we make up our minds that we are to bankrupt the Government and the country the better. Here were forty-five acres of land occupied by this Government for four or five years, for which it paid, if I understand the report aright, $4,900, about half the amount the land was valued at for the purpose of taxation; and here is a claim made up against the Government of probably a great deal more than the land was ever worth at the time it was occupied. We shall have any quantity of these claims made on the Government, and I think we had better stop right here.

I have no doubt that the Government paid for the use of this land all it was worth at the time. I do not know whether there is any evidence here from the quartermaster's department that the department would have paid more if it had authority to do it. It may be that the officers of that department would have made some allowance if they had been authorized to do so; but it appears to me that we paid a large price for the use of the land—vastly more than the land was worth for agricultural purposes—and I have no doubt that in making this payment allowance was made for the damages done to the fences and trees, and the land itself. Here is a claim of more than twenty thousand dollars for the use of forty-five acres of land, after the claimant has already received $4,900 of the Government, and it is proposed to pay him $3,000.

Mr. CONKLING. How much was received for the land?

Mr. WILSON. Four thousand nine hundred dollars for the use of it. If we commence these payments, we shall have to pay these extravagant and unpatriotic claims wherever our armies camped in this war, and I suppose we shall yet have to pay for the battle-fields on which we fought. I think it is time to stop and let the people of this country understand that this nation is not to be plundered for years to come for the benefit of men who made money out of the war. Let the proper Department of this Government pay for the use of these lands what they deem to be fair. I am willing that they shall do that. But I want to keep these claims out of Congress. Let us try to save these expenses. If we commence to pay this class of damages there will never be an end of them, and the Treasury of the country will be plundered out of millions and millions of dollars. Sir, this claim cannot be an honest claim, or if it is, the Committee on Claims is an unjust committee. It bears on its very face an attempt to get a sum of money out of the Treasury of this country wrongfully. The whole thing is unjust. The very report of the committee proposing to pay $3,000, where $20,800 were claimed, shows that the committee believed the claim to be a dishonest claim. In my opinion, the best way to treat a claim thus made, in which it is proposed to pay one dollar out of seven claimed, is to pay nothing at all. I hope, sir, that this Senate and this Congress will make no appropriations of this character.

Mr. BUCKALEW obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will give way, if the Senator desires to speak.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not claim the floor from the Senator from Pennsylvania; I did not observe that he had taken it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I give way with great pleasure; I do not care to occupy it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, this case affords a very apt illustration of the class of claims which we are to have against this Government. Here was a tract of land occupied as a camp by the Union soldiers in the State of Indiana. The quartermaster's department have paid what they considered a fair compensation for the use of the land, I presume; at any rate they have paid $4,500 for the use of some forty odd acres of land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Four thousand nine hundred and fifty-one dollars and eighty-one cents, nearly five thousand dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Nearly five thousand dollars for the use of this land; and now the owner of the land comes here and proves the value of the rails that were destroyed and the value of the apple trees. He proves the rails to have been worth six dollars a hundred and the apple trees to have been worth twenty-five dollars apiece. He proves that the troops dug ditches upon this land and that it has been injured very extensively for agricultural purposes, and that it will cost a large amount of money to restore it to its original condition, and he makes up claims amounting to between twenty and thirty thousand dollars more than he has already been paid. If we are to commence that sort of payments I ask the Senate to pause for a moment to consider what it will lead to. If we are to pay the damages that shall be proved by neighbors, on ex parte testimony, I do not believe we shall have money enough in the Treasury to pay our expenses if we keep up the taxes at the highest limit that we have had them at any time during the war. I think we shall have to go to making loans again. This report shows how the case is made up.

It reminds me very much of a case which arose in the Senate, soon after I became a member of this body, from the State of Alabama, growing out of the war of 1812. The claimant was the owner of some one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty acres of land, according to my recollection, upon which he had a corn-field, and that corn was destroyed by our troops in some of the Indian difficulties that arose in that country about the year 1812. The claimant came here claiming damages for the destruction of that property. The proof was not clear whether it was destroyed by our troops or by the Indians. The party was paid what was supposed to be the value of the property, somewhere about 1830, I think. He got some five thousand dollars or ten thousand dollars damages. However, some of his proof, it was claimed, was excluded. He came again afterward and got interest upon this at a subsequent session of Congress. After I came into Congress, somewhere between 1855 and 1860, he came here with that claim again. He had up to that time, my recollection is, received some fifteen thousand dollars for his one hundred and forty acres of corn. He proved the corn to be worth some three dollars a bushel. He proved that he would have raised the most extraordinary crops, I think, one hundred bushels to the acre. Scarcely ever was there such a corn-field known as that was proved to be. [Laughter.] He got pay for this originally, half of it, I think. Then it was insisted that he could have proven that our troops destroyed the whole of it, but the proof was excluded on the ground of some informality, and a little bill was brought in here one day to allow the case to be opened in order to let in this testimony that had been excluded for informality. The case was allowed to be opened; he came in with his new proof, and he was then allowed $60,000 for the corn-field.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend give way for a suggestion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I have got several cases that I want the Senate to consider, and, as I find we must go over a very broad field of debate before we shall come to a vote on this bill, I would prefer to move to postpone its further consideration for the present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall have no objection in a moment. I want to end the story which I was telling in this Alabama case. I am very nearly through.

Mr. HOWE. It was to avoid that story that I wanted to postpone the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am nearly through. The claimant got $60,000 additional. Congress found this out at its next session, and we succeeded in getting a resolution through both Houses of Congress to stop payment of it, and I believe the last $60,000 was never paid. This looks to me very much like that case. If we open this door and allow this sort of claims to come into Congress there will be no end to them. I commend the Committee on Claims for what they have done in this case. They have cut it down. We have an excellent committee. They would not allow this claim of twenty odd thousand dollars; but cut it down to $3,000. Perhaps the party really may be entitled to something; but, sir, we have all had to suffer in this war, and the owner of this property, if he has got $5,000 for the use of forty or fifty acres of land for three or four years, has not suffered very deeply, and it would be better that he should bear and contribute something to the support of the Government than that its Treasury should be opened to all sorts of claims. I will not take up time, because the Senator desires to postpone the case.

Mr. HOWE. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will let us proceed with the consideration of this bill now.

Mr. HOWE. Let me say to the Senator before he goes on that my purpose is to save time in the consideration of the general file of private bills. I am sorry for the sake of the committee, more so than the Senator can be for the sake of his fellow-citizen, after listening to the remarks which have now been made, to have this bill now go from the consideration of the Senate until those remarks have been replied to; but I feel compelled to move it because it seems pretty evident that this one little claim will consume the rest of the afternoon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will call this up as soon as he gets through with the bills not objected to.

Mr. HOWE. I will call it up at once after the other cases are disposed of, if the Senate will indulge me in taking it up.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I gave way to the Senator from Illinois, although I desired to submit some remarks on this bill. I do not care to interrupt the proceedings of the Senate, however, to speak if the subject is to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator has no objection to letting it pass over for the present?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose there will be no "to-morrow" for this bill, at any rate within any considerable period.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator is mistaken. There will be a double-breasted to-morrow for its time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKALEW. What I desire to speak of is our general policy with reference to these claims—a very large and very important subject.

Mr. HOWE. I agree with the Senator that it is, and I should be very happy to hear him on that subject if he will allow me to get rid of this bill at this time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, as to this particular claim I do not know anything about it. I shall be found agreeing with the committee at all times when they report bills to us upon the principle that justice is the first duty which the Government owes to the citizen; and I will agree with them or with any other competent committee at all times that when a case is made out appealing to our sense of justice we should accede to the demand, no matter whether it be convenient or not.

But, sir, there is another thing which does not seem to attract the attention of gentlemen, and that is, that these claim cases will accumulate in number and will grow in amount the longer they are postponed. I protest against that species of argument in relation to them which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] entered upon this morning, and against the policy to which his remarks point; and that is, the pushing away of these claims for the time being, rejecting or postponing them. It is simply putting off the evil day, and it is accumulating against the Treasury of the United States a body of demands which will eventually tax it two or three times over the amount of outlay which we should incur if we met them promptly and while they were fresh. Two years ago, I think it was, I introduced a bill, and sent it to the Committee on Claims, providing for a system of investigation in reference to all these demands, and, what was more important, providing a statute of limitation upon claimants, a limitation of time after which claims should not be presented or considered by the Government of the United States. Unless we have some general legislation on this subject there will be no end to the claim bills which will be presented here, and it will be the most short-sighted and foolish policy that can be imagined to attempt to vote down individual bills or to postpone them with the expectation that thereby we shall save the Treasury of the United States. It is the very system which will accumulate against the Treasury a vast body of demands that will eventually be met, and that will be much greater in amount than if we met and determined them promptly.

Therefore, sir, whenever this bill comes up again, if the chairman of the Committee on Claims makes out a case of apparent justice for this claim, I stand ready to vote the amount and vote it promptly, because, as I said before, justice is a duty above all others which the Government owes to her citizens, and if you do not provide by some general legislation a mode and manner by which these claims can be investigated and heard outside of Congress there can be no reason why they should not be heard in Congress. So that both upon grounds of right and upon grounds of public policy I protest against the mode of action which is supported by the Senator from Massachusetts, a mode merely of postponing, of delaying, of putting off the evil day to some other occasion, without making any provision for ending and bringing to a termination this system of claim cases against the Government of the United States connected with the late war.

I am very sorry that my bill, introduced on a former occasion, did not pass both Houses of Congress. If I had been a member of the majority at that time, and responsible for the legislation of the Government, I should have been more prompt and zealous in pressing that bill. It did meet the approval of the Committee on Claims; but I left it to them to say whether it should be pressed, and the result was that nothing was done. Now, sir, that committee will be deluged with these cases, and there will be no end to the difficulty and harassment, both of that committee and of Congress, until you provide, by some general bill, a mode and manner of prompt and thorough investigation of these claim cases.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I cannot resist the proposition of the Senator having in charge these private bills; but, before this bill passes from the attention of the Senate, I desire to say that I hope as soon as we get through the bills that are not objected to we shall very earnestly urge the consideration of this one. I wish simply to add another thing, that I did not indorse the doctrine of the Senator from Massachusetts, that because claims are likely to amount to a large sum of money therefore they ought not to be paid; and I repudiate the doctrine of the Senator from Illinois, that this claimant ought to bear his proportion of the public burdens, or, rather, his application of that idea to this particular claimant. He is willing to bear his proportion, but he did not think it right, and I do not think it right, that the Government should strip his land of very valuable improvements and then say to him that he shall bear that entire loss and the public not share with him in it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I know something about this claimant whose premises were used. I do not think the committee have got the damages too high; they might, perhaps, have been put higher without impropriety; but I want to enter my protest against the doctrine enunciated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that we are to disallow all these claims, because if we do not we shall have a vast amount of claims on the Government.

Mr. President, there cannot be a very large amount of these claims in the loyal States. This is very different from taking lands, timber, property in the rebel States during the conduct of the war. Here is land that was taken by the Government from necessity in a loyal State, and the claim for its use or for damages done to it is just as honest, to the extent it goes, as a claim for payment for quartermasters' stores. I would appeal to the sense of justice of that Senator himself what can the Government offer as an objection to the payment of actual damages done to a piece of property taken in the loyal States for the purpose of organizing troops? If damages have been inflicted upon property, if a man's property is taken by the Government for its uses, and he suffers greatly by that use of it, it is dishonest in the Government to refuse to consider that claim, just as much so as it would be to refuse to pay a debt contracted in any other way. What is the difference? If the Government takes provisions, or contracts for them, it is bound to pay for them if it takes them from a loyal man in a loyal State; and if it takes his property, his real estate, and uses it, why should it not pay him for it?

Mr. President, I want to make a general remark here. While there are a great many spurious claims brought up against the Government, some of which are allowed from time to time, I undertake to say that the Government often inflicts the foulest injustice, and that claims which are right and honest in themselves and which involve a man's whole fortune, the interests of himself and his family, are often put aside without even a consideration. The Government has no more right to do a wrong of that kind than a private individual. I know of some claims which have been pending here for years that have had no attention paid to them, which are honest, and because they have not been paid the owners of them have been involved in almost total ruin.

I know it is somewhat popular, or at least is so regarded by some, to refuse to pay all claims, to say "the Government will pay nothing, because if the Government pays anything it will be overwhelmed." Sir, that is not the right principle. The Government will some time or other pay these claims. They will be pressed, and pressed until they are paid; and wherever there is an honest one that is clearly made out it might as well be allowed now as at any time. But the claims of this character, to which the Senator from Massachusetts alludes, cannot be very large. I make a broad distinction between claims of this character in the loyal States, where the Government has taken property for the purpose of organizing camps of instruction or building up camps of organization, and claims for the taking of property in the southern States for carrying on the war. If you undertake to pay the latter class they will bankrupt the Government; but the other class, of which the one before the Senate is an example, do not amount to very much. Where the Government has taken a man's property in the city of Indianapolis or of any other place in the North, and used it for the purpose of there organizing troops, and it has been damaged, it is just as honest to pay for it as to pay for any other debt that could possibly be created.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE B. HALSTEAD.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 128) for the relief of George B. Halstead was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate a sum sufficient to pay George B. Halstead the regular compensation of first lieutenant in the Army of the United States from the 11th of November, 1861, to April 1, 1862.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

BEALS AND DIXON.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 217.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 217) for the relief of Beals & Dixon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the accounts of Beals & Dixon, for the delivery of material after May 1, 1861, under their contracts with the United States, to be adjusted and paid, allowing to them such additional prices for material delivered after May 1, 1861, as they may be justly entitled to under the provisions of their supplementary contract dated January 1, 1857, the same to be adjusted by the proper officer and in the manner named in the contract.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know why that account cannot be settled now without any additional legislation.

Mr. HOWE. I was about to state. The case is somewhat peculiar, and I feel bound to state to the Senate the point involved in it. The point is very simple. On the 10th of October, 1855, Beals & Dixon, this firm, contracted with the Treasury Department to furnish the granite for the south wing of the new Treasury building. The contract was reduced to writing. The only part of it that I need read is the last clause, which is:

"It is also agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that the said parties of the second part are to furnish the material for the outside of the remainder of the Treasury building at the prices heretofore named for similar work, when Congress may have made the necessary appropriations therefor: Provided, That at that time it is deemed for the interest of the United States to employ them."

The contract to furnish the granite for the south wing was to be completed within two years, and was completed. On the 1st of January, 1857, this addition was made to the contract:

"Congress having made an appropriation continuing the extension of the Treasury building, and it being deemed to be the interest of the United States that the parties of the second part should furnish the material for the outside of the remainder of the building and above the cellar wall, pursuant to the last clause of the within contract, it is hereby agreed by and between the parties to the within contract that the parties of the second part shall furnish the material required for said extension as above noted, in all respects as provided in the within contract, and at the same price and within a reasonable time, and any departure from these conditions, or changes, increasing or lessening the cost of materials, and any and all differences growing out of this extension of the contract shall be adjudged by the superintendent of the work upon pro rata principles, and the decision of the superintendent shall be final between the parties."

Under this contract the petitioners went on delivering granite until in March, 1859, when, by the order of the Department, they were stopped from delivering any more granite for the time being, and that continued for about two years. Sometime in the year 1861 they were ordered to proceed again with the delivery. In the meantime the cost of procuring and delivering this material had greatly enhanced, as the petitioners allege. This change increased the cost of doing the work, as they say, and they insisted that, under this clause of the contract, the superintendent should adjust this additional cost of procuring the material upon the principles of the contract. The Secretary of the Treasury, it seems, had some doubt as to whether he could make that adjustment or not, and thereupon these petitioners came to Congress, and Congress passed a resolution, approved May 2, 1866, providing:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to cause the accounts of Beals & Dixon, for deliveries of material after May 1, 1861, under their contract with the United States, to be adjusted and paid, allowing to said Beals & Dixon such additional prices for material delivered after May 1, 1861, as, in his opinion, they may be justly entitled to under the provisions of their supplementary contract, dated January 1, 1857: Provided, That, in the opinion of the Attorney General, said Beals & Dixon have a legal claim upon the United States for an increase of prices under said contract."

Under that resolution the question was referred to the Attorney General to say whether they had a legal claim under the contract upon the Government for this increased cost of procuring the material, and Attorney General Speed decided that they had not. His opinion was before the committee. I do not care to take the time of the Senate by reading his opinion. The committee have not drawn an opinion in reply to it; but it all turns on the language in the supplementary contract which I have read. The committee were of the opinion that they had a legal claim. I am not sure but that there was one member of the committee who dissented from that view, but all the members of the committee were of opinion that they had an equitable claim, and that the mode provided in the contract itself was an equitable mode of adjusting the matter; and to that end they have reported this joint resolution, which has already passed the House of Representatives, and which provides that this additional cost shall be adjusted in the mode provided in the contract itself by the superintendent of the work.

Mr. JOHNSON. His judgment to be conclusive?

Mr. HOWE. His judgment to be conclusive. It is within the knowledge of every Senator that the delay from 1859 to 1861 must have operated injuriously, because everybody knows, it is matter of common fame, that the cost of doing all sorts of work has been much higher since that period than it was for the two years or any years previous to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was it not suspended after 1861?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; at least that does not appear.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it was.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand that there is any claim for any such suspension. Now, sir, where there was no pretense of a contract to that effect, Congress has in several instances awarded this extra cost. It has done it in the case of contracts for building vessels, and it did it in the case of contractors who furnished the material for the Dome of the Capitol; and in this case, if there were no pretense of a contract, I take it Congress might say it would take the testimony and itself adjust the price; but this resolution, following the provision made in the contract, refers it to the superintendent of the work to adjust that amount. My own judgment is that that is as safe a reference as could be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the architect.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. If the Committee on Claims undertook to take the testimony they would be in the main controlled by the testimony of the architect; probably his testimony would be as satisfactory as any testimony that could be obtained. The committee deemed this the most convenient mode, the fairest one of settling it, even if there was nothing but an equitable claim before us; but it was the opinion of nearly the whole, if not the whole, of the committee, that the rights of the petitioners were regulated by the contract itself, and by the terms of that contract they had a right to have this adjusted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I knew something about this claim on the part of these gentlemen. It so happened that while I was in the Treasury Department application was made to me to readjust the prices under this contract. I examined the contract very carefully, and came to the conclusion that I had no power to do it; that it was not within my legal competency as Secretary of the Treasury to readjust the matter, but that these gentlemen must come to Congress. They came to Congress with this resolution, or one somewhat like it, which they desired to have passed. They put it upon a legal ground, that they had a legal claim upon the Government for a larger price, and particularly for some damages that they had incurred, I think, in consequence of the fact that their wharf was taken possession of by the Government and used, and they were put to some extra expense in the way of hauling, &c. Congress did not act on the case while I was in the Department. The matter then came to the Committee on Finance, of which I was a member at that time, and I had some conversation with Mr. Dixon. I found that he was still disposed to put it upon the legal ground, to assert that he had a legal claim. I told him that in my judgment he had no legal claim; I examined it carefully as a lawyer; but as he was disposed to put it upon that ground I drew the resolution so as to leave it in that shape, that if the contractors had a legal claim it should be enforced, and for that purpose I put in a clause that it should be referred to the Attorney General to decide whether they had a legal claim or not. It was so referred, and the Attorney General decided in accordance with the opinion which I had expressed and which I entertain now, that there was no such claim in law.

While I say this, sir, I say very distinctly that I think these gentlemen have a strong, equitable claim upon the consideration of Congress to be allowed more than they have received. They have gone on in spite of the very great increase of prices with remarkable energy and a disposition to fulfill their contract to the letter, cost what it would or be the consequences what they might; and they have, so far as I am aware, and I have no doubt it is so, fulfilled that contract very considerably to their own loss. I think Mr. Beals, however, died some time since, and Mr. Dixon is the only one now living of the original contractors. They have at any rate done their work well and faithfully and thoroughly. I believe no fault is found with them in that particular.

Under the circumstances presented I had the impression at the time, and I have it now, that these gentlemen have a strong, equitable claim upon the consideration of Congress. I am perfectly willing to vote for a bill which shall put the matter in such shape as to give them what they ought to receive. What that may be I do not know. I believe no prices are fixed in the contract except the first prices, which might be varied afterward according to circumstances.

I doubt very much whether the resolution on the table will reach their case, for it strikes me—I have just looked at it—that it confines them to the legal claim. It goes upon the ground that there is a power to readjust existing; and from the words of it I am afraid that if it passes as it stands they will meet with the same difficulties again that they have met heretofore, and it will be contended that they have no legal claim under the contract. I am perfectly willing to vote for the resolution in any shape that will be safe, which will accomplish the purpose of making them an equitable and fair allowance for what they have done.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the particular part of the resolution which authorizes the readjustment of the account.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Allowing to said Beals & Dixon such additional prices for material delivered after May 1, 1861, as they may be justly entitled to, under the provisions of their supplementary contract dated January 1, 1857; the same to be adjusted by the proper officer and in the manner named in the contract."

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that the Attorney General's right in his construction of that contract, and of course I am not sure that the honorable member from Maine is correct, although the fact that they have both concurred in giving that opinion is entitled to the consideration of the Senate. If they be right I submit to the honorable chairman of the committee that perhaps the claimant will be in the situation in which he is after we pass this measure. If I understand it, the matter is to be adjusted upon the principles of the contract of 1857. If by that contract they are not entitled to be paid the additional expense to which they have been subjected I should be very apprehensive that under this resolution they would receive nothing. My own impression is, and it was very strong until the honorable member from Maine expressed a contrary opinion, that under that contract they had a legal claim; but if that be doubtful, and that should be the continuing opinion of the Department, they might get nothing under the resolution as it stands. The probability is that such is the general usage of the Attorney General's office that even if the construction of that contract was referred again to that office the Attorney General would consider it as settled by the opinion of his predecessor, and, if so, the parties would have to stand upon the contract, not being relieved as to that, I fear, by the frame of the particular resolution. I submit, therefore, to the honorable chairman that he had better use some general phraseology which will clearly authorize the superintendent to settle the claim upon principles of equity and justice, independent of any legal construction of the contract of 1857.

Mr. DAVIS. I will suggest an amendment that I think will meet the difficulty. I propose to insert in line eleven, after "1857," the words "and upon principles of equity and justice."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would be rather too indefinite, I think. I understand, however, that they prefer to take the resolution as it is now rather than to run the hazard of sending it back again to the House of Representatives. That being the case, I shall make no objection to it.

Mr. HOWE. This joint resolution was drawn by the House committee and passed by the House of Representatives, and comes to the Senate from our committee as it came to the committee from the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that the claimants prefer to have it just as it is.

Mr. HOWE. I am inclined to think there will not be any serious doubt as to the meaning of the resolution. If there is it can be cleared up by a subsequent enactment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I would not amend it. My suggestion was made for their benefit.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I do so. I still believe that the opinion of the Attorney General was grossly incorrect. I have no doubt about that in my own mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on granting the request of the Senator from California.

The request was granted.

CHARLES E. CAPEHART.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 473.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of Charles E. Capehart was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Paymaster General of the Army to pay to Charles E. Capehart, late captain of company A, of the first regiment of West Virginia cavalry volunteers, the pay and allowances of a captain of cavalry from the 2d day of July, 1862, to the 1st day of March, 1863, and after deducting therefrom any sums of money heretofore paid Capehart by the pay department for his services for that time; but he is to present the usual certificates required by the rules of the pay department upon final payment of volunteer officers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAN ELLIS.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the bill (S. No. 474) for the relief of Captain Dan Ellis was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $3,000 to Captain Dan Ellis, of Carter county, in the State of Tennessee, in compensation for his services as scout, pilot, and recruiting agent, volunteered in the cause of the Government, from 1861 to 1865, during the late war.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to hear the report of that case.

Mr. HOWE. This bill was reported yesterday, and the report is not yet in print, but I will state the character of the case upon which the bill is founded.

This man Ellis is a resident of eastern Tennessee, and he was there at the outset of the war. The testimony shows that he was one of those fervent East Tennessean patriots, who, when that community were taken possession of by the rebel army, devoted himself to the work of getting out from the community and within the Federal lines such of his fellow-citizens as he could; that he spent his whole time in that work; that he took out through the lines several thousand people. I have not the facts before me just now; but I think the testimony shows that about two regiments in our Army were composed of Tennesseans whom he took out of that community, and procured to enlist in our Army. He continued in this service up to the spring of 1865, and then was commissioned a captain in one of the Tennessee regiments. Of course there is no legal claim resting on the Government, but it has a character of service which the committee thought required some acknowledgment, and they have reported a bill which gives him the pay of a captain for two years.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. N. GOULDING.

Mr. HOWE. I now ask the Senate to take up some bills reported to-day, but I suppose it requires unanimous consent to do that. They are not yet in print, but I think they will not be disputed. The first one is a bill for the relief of C. N. Goulding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be taken up if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 251) for the relief of Charles N. Goulding, late quartermaster of volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be and they are hereby authorized to allow and place to the credit of Charles N. Goulding, late captain and assistant quartermaster, in the final settlement of his accounts as such officer, such amounts and sums as he shall satisfactorily prove to have been captured either in money or vouchers, by the enemy in the month of August, 1862, while on duty in the Army of Virginia, under Major General John Pope: Provided, That no greater amount for losses shall so be passed to his credit than the balance now appearing against him on the books of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

C. C. O'NEILL.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Charles C. O'Neill, reported to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 477) for the relief of Charles C. O'Neill, was read the second time, and considered in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $5,351 to Charles C. O'Neill, as balance due him in the final liquidation of his claim against the United States under a contract for the delivery of ten thousand cords of wood to the officers of the Government near Nashville, Tennessee, dated December 24, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. D. MCKINNEY.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of H. D. McKinney, reported to-day.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of H. D. McKinney was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $6,035 53 to H. D. McKinney as balance due him in final liquidation of his claim against the United States under a contract for the delivery of ten thousand cords of wood to the officers of the Government near Nashville, Tennessee, dated December 24, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. PALMER.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble to the resolution recites that John M. Palmer, of Nashville, Tennessee, on the 7th August, 1866, contracted with the quartermaster's department to manufacture and deliver fifty-two thousand two hundred coffins for the interment of deceased Union soldiers at Natchez, Vicksburg, and Corinth, Mississippi; Memphis, Pittsburg Landing, Fort Donelson, and Nashville, Tennessee; and Marietta, Georgia, and also to erect fences for the national cemeteries at Natchez, Vicksburg, and Corinth; Mississippi, and at Memphis, Fort Donelson, Stone River, and Pittsburg Landing, Tennessee; that by the malicious destruction of Palmer's steam saw-mill and machinery by rebel incendiaries, and the loss of lumber by providential floods, but by no fault or neglect of his own, he has failed to fully complete his contract, and has incurred forfeitures to the Government thereon.

The resolution proposes to relieve Palmer from all stoppages and forfeitures on account of his failure to deliver coffins under the contract, and to direct the Quartermaster General to adjust and settle his further claim for erecting fences around the national cemeteries by an additional allowance of $7,283 70, to be paid from the appropriation provided in an act entitled "An act to establish and protect national cemeteries," approved February 22, 1867.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the resolution by adding as an additional section:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the chief quartermaster of the military department of the Cumberland, in addition to the contract price of ninety cents for each coffin manufactured by the said John M. Palmer, under his contract aforesaid, of the date of the 27th of August, 1866, cause to be paid out of any money under his control unto the said John M. Palmer the further sum of $12,716 30 for manufacturing and delivering said coffins: Provided, That the said John M. Palmer shall, in conformity with the provisions of his contract aforesaid, well and truly manufacture and deliver all the coffins which he is thereby still required to manufacture and deliver.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator who has this measure in charge to explain it to us.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the facts in this case are somewhat complicated and numerous. They are much more clearly within the recollection of the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] than they are within mine, and I will ask him to state them.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York desires a presentation of the facts of the case, I do not know that he can be better satisfied than by the reading of the report. They are as concisely stated in the report as I could state them; and if the Senate desire a full statement of the facts I should myself prefer that the report should be read, although it is somewhat lengthy.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. WILLEY on the 27th of March:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 218, for the relief of John M. Palmer, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

That among the papers accompanying the said joint resolution they find the following report made to the House by the Committee of Claims in that body:

To the honorable the Committee of Claims:

The sub-committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John M. Palmer, for relief in the matter of his contract for furnishing coffins for interment of deceased Union soldiers and fencing national cemeteries, have the honor to report as follows:

From the copy of the contract presented by the memorialist it appears that—

1. He contracted with competent authority to furnish fifty-two thousand coffins, as might be ordered, of specified sizes and material, to be delivered as required in numbers and quantities, at different points, namely: Natchez, Vicksburg, and Corinth, Mississippi; Memphis, Pittsburg Landing, Fort Donelson, and Nashville, Tennessee; and at Marietta, Georgia, at ninety cents each; and that he was to erect a fence around the national cemeteries at Natchez, Vicksburg, and Corinth, Mississippi; Fort Donelson, Pittsburg Landing, and Stone River, Tennessee, and at any other points that should be designated by the Government. These fences to be constructed of specified materials and dimensions, and in a manner described, at the price of forty-five cents per lineal foot. (See copy contract herewith, marked No. 2.)

The memorialist further sets forth in his petition that, before he proposed to furnish the coffins and erect the fences called for by the contract, he all the time made every exertion to get such information as to what the cost of the work would be as would enable him to make his bid at a reasonable price; and that he was the lowest responsible bidder, which latter fact is certified to (see paper marked —) by Colonel S. R. Hamill, then acting chief quartermaster military division of Tennessee, and still an officer in the quartermaster's department.

The petitioner further sets forth that immediately upon the award of the work to him he gave bonds for $35,000, with approved security, and began to put forth every requisite energy and effort to fulfill his agreement. He was the owner of one saw-mill at a convenient point for supplying Nashville and Stone River, which he at once put in operation in getting out the required lumber; and erected another saw-mill at Johnsonville, on the Tennessee river, which was a favorable location for supplying lumber to the points where it was required on that river and the Mississippi and Cumberland rivers; and that he at once commenced traversing the country from point to point where the material and labor were to be supplied and applied, and made arrangements for the requisite labor, transportation, and everything necessary to carry out his contracts.

The petitioner further sets forth that, as soon as he set about this business of fulfilling his contract, he found himself the object of a combined opposition, comprising a portion of the seventy odd unsuccessful bidders for the same contract, and also the common enemies of the country, who cherished a most bitter hatred toward the purposes of the work, (see statement of Mr. Barnshaw, chairman of the cemetery board for selecting and laying out the grounds of national cemeteries, No. 18;) that this opposition manifested itself in his being followed from place to place by men who made various false reports, such as the statements that he was not able to carry out the work; that he had abandoned the contract; that he had absconded; that the Government had taken the contract from him; and many other false reports that were calculated to, and did for a time, destroy confidence in the petitioner's integrity, ability, and competence in carrying out his agreement, and having the effect to repeatedly break up the arrangements he had made for labor and materials, and delay him in procuring the requisites of his undertaking, and enhancing the prices of the same, and adding largely to his expenses; that, further, the saw-mill he erected at Johnsonville, on which he relied for a large quantity of lumber, was, during the first two months of its operation, almost wholly obstructed by its machinery being repeatedly broken by men hostile to him or to the objects of his efforts, and before three months had elapsed from the time the mill was erected it was set on fire on a dark and rainy night and burned to the ground, under circumstances which left no doubt of its being the work of men who were evil-disposed toward the petitioner. (See, also, statement of J. G. Allen, paper No. 3; George Bailey, No. 6; A. T. Prentiss, paper No. 5; J. D. Millard, paper No. 14; William Welsh, paper No. 15, and A. F. Prentiss, paper No. 7.)

The petitioner further sets forth that, besides the difficulties which beset him as stated heretofore, the time from the date of the advertisement for proposals to the date of opening the bids was not sufficient to enable a bidder to go to the various points, embracing over two thousand miles of travel, at which labor was to be performed, and survey the ground and obtain definite information as to the cost of labor, materials, transportation, &c., but that estimates had to be made upon general reports and such knowledge as could be hastily gathered, and that he calculated the cost of materials, labor, transportation, and incidental expenses at a much lower figure than he found himself compelled to pay; in addition to this the unprecedented flood at one time and the very low state of the rivers at another made the cost of transportation by water, on which he greatly depended, treble the ordinary cost; and the price he had to pay for lumber was, in many instances, more than double what he anticipated; that in some localities at Vicksburg the ground on which he erected fences was partially covered by water, and that another portion was required over high hills, which were terraced, and thereby the expense was more than doubled. That the fence at Fort Donelson was required at a time when the water did not admit of navigation, and instead of getting his lumber by that ordinary transportation, and being unable to purchase what was required from any point near by, had to carry it by wagons across the country over rough, hilly roads; also that, in erecting the fence at this point, he encountered a ledge of shelly rock, which, not being firm enough to admit of bolting the posts, he was obliged to dig holes therein, which was a great increase of expense upon his estimate.

In a paper which is filed with the memorial, to wit, a communication from the petitioner to General Swords, assistant quartermaster general, it is stated that the petitioner was subjected to unexpected expense by the failure of payments being made to him once a month, according to the contract; that he had been obliged to sell vouchers at a heavy discount and to borrow a large amount of money, paying interest at the rate of two per cent. a month, to enable him to carry on the work; which statement General Swords indorses as true.

All the statements recited or referred to as made by the petitioner in his memorial are sworn to by him as true, and are sustained by Colonel E. B. Whitman, acting quartermaster and superintendent national cemeteries, by his official certificate, to which especial attention is invited. General George H. Thomas also indorses the memorial, recommending its favorable consideration by Congress. In support of the statement of facts made by the petitioner in his memorial the testimony of quite a number of other persons cognizant of the facts and circumstances bearing on the case is submitted and will be briefly noticed.

The sworn statement of J. B. Allen (paper No. 3) shows that the petitioner, as soon as the contract was awarded, went to work with great energy in getting out lumber at his saw-mill near Nashville and in erecting another mill at Johnsonville; that he encountered unforeseen obstacles and trouble in running said mill; its machinery was repeatedly broken in a manner that showed the use of sledge-hammers and appliances as could not have resulted from the ordinary operation of the mill, but purposely by malicious and evil-disposed parties; that threats were made against him; and when it was found he was not to be intimidated inducements of money were offered him to effect the stoppage of the mill; and that, these proving of no avail, the mill was finally fired by incendiaries and burned to the ground; that another was at once erected on the spot and run day and night, but was very soon obstructed by a flood, which covered it for several weeks; and that as soon as possible it was put in running order, and the work carried forward with all possible dispatch in the face of all the impediments which were thrown in the way.

The sworn statement of John Welsh (paper No. 15) coincides with that of J. G. Allen as to the hostility the petitioner encountered in running his saw-mill at Johnsonville, and the facts of its being broken, stopped, and finally burned by persons evilly disposed toward the petitioner, and the work he was endeavoring to carry out, and the damage and delay resulting therefrom.

The sworn statement of J. D. Millard (paper No. 14) corroborates J. G. Allen in all material parts, and further sets forth that the contract price was much less than the cost of fulfilling it.

The sworn statement of A. T. Prentiss (paper No. 5) shows that he, being employed by the petitioner in erecting fences at Stone river, Corinth, Memphis, Vicksburg, and Natchez, knows that he put forth every exertion possible in prosecuting the work under his contract, working by day and traveling by night; that he met with many hindrances resulting from the hostility of some of the inhabitants of the localities to the work; that he suffered loss, delay, and heavy expense from the burning of his saw-mill, and the flood which covered the one erected on the river; that the contract price was much less than the actual cost of the work under the adverse circumstances; that the price of lumber was much higher than anticipated, oak being fifty dollars per thousand, and pine and poplar, fit for the work, was thirty to thirty-five dollars per thousand; that five thousand feet of fence at Vicksburg had to be set over hills too steep for men to stand without some other support than the ground for their feet; and that considerable was set when the water covered the ground, and which was the cause of loss of time and increase of expense; but that, notwithstanding, the petitioner carried out his work satisfactorily to the inspecting officers.

The sworn statement of James Saunders corroborates that of A. T. Prentiss in most of the material points; and further, the statement of the petitioner as to the transportation of lumber across the country (when the water was too low for navigation) at a heavy expense, over rough, hilly roads, and as to the difficulty and great cost of setting the posts in the shelly rock.

The sworn statement of James Walker corroborates Saunders as to the difficulties of getting lumber and setting the posts at Fort Donelson.

The sworn statement of George Bailey (paper No. 6) coincides with that of J. G. Allen as to the hostility manifested by citizens of Johnsonville toward the purposes for which the mill of petitioner at that place was erected, and as to the machinery being purposely broken, and the mill finally burned by incendiaries; and as to the erection of another, and the subsequent delay of its operation by reason of floods. It also corroborates the statements of James Saunders and John Walker as to the difficulties encountered in getting lumber to Fort Donelson, and in the erection of the fences in the rocky ground.

The official statement of Lieutenant Gurney, acting quartermaster, (see paper No. 10,) concurs with that of Prentiss, Walker, and Saunders as to being obliged to transport lumber across the country to Fort Donelson because of low water, and as to the rock into which holes for the fence posts had to be made, which involved considerable expense, and, further, shows the satisfactory manner in which the contract was fulfilled at that place.

The sworn statement of W. G. Bond (see paper No. 9) is substantially the same as that of Lieutenant Gurney.

The sworn statement of J. B. Armstrong (paper No. 17) shows that he has known the petitioner for twenty years, and knows him to be a man of integrity, great energy, and that he was untiring in his efforts and labors to carry out this contract for supplying coffins and fences to national cemeteries in every way fully equal to its requirements; that he knows the petitioner incurred great loss and unexpected expense in fulfilling the same; and that, aside from the unforeseen losses and expenses growing out of the work, the contract price was inadequate.

The sworn statement of Junius M. Palmer sets forth the facts that he superintended the fulfillment of the contract at Vicksburg, and concurs with the statement of Prentiss, that the cost of lumber was for oak, fifty dollars per thousand; that yellow pine and cypress cost thirty dollars per thousand; white pine seventy-five to eighty dollars per thousand; that the coffins made thus cost nearly two dollars each; that the cost of erecting the fence on ground overflowed by water and over the hilly, terraced ground, was five times as great as it would have been on good ground; that the price stated in the contract is not nearly sufficient to cover the amount actually paid out, aside from the losses by fire and flood, and the other causes beyond the control of the petitioner.

The sworn statement of William Earnshaw, late chaplain United States Army, and chairman of the board for purchasing and laying out cemeteries in the division of Tennessee, sets forth that he had full opportunities for knowing the expenses of building fences and making coffins under the petitioner's contract, and of the unfriendly and hostile feelings of the people of that country toward the object of said work, and of the difficulties the petitioner encountered from said cause, as well from obstacles thrown in his way by unsuccessful bidders for the same contract; that one dollar per lineal foot for the fence, and $2 50 for each coffin, would be a very reasonable price for the then furnishing of the same, and that said price is less than the Government procured them for, except at Nashville; that he, Earnshaw, carefully read the memorial of the petitioner, and that the facts and matters therein set forth are true; that of his own knowledge they are not too strongly stated, but rather fall short of the real facts of the case; that he deemed it impossible for the petitioner to fulfill the contract under so many difficulties, and with the determined opposition of common enemies of the country, with that of the unsuccessful bidders for the same contract; that the life of the petitioner was often in great peril, and that it was only by his courage and indomitable energy that he overcame the many impediments thrown in his way; that he had a good opportunity of knowing the motive which actuated the petitioner in making his bid at the extremely low price, and that his motives were praiseworthy, and that he entered into the contract in good faith, and carried it into execution; that he, Earnshaw, firmly believes that, unless relief be granted petitioner, he will be financially ruined.

The official statement of J. W. Scully, acting quartermaster, confirms the statements of Prentiss and Junius M. Palmer as to the price of oak lumber at Vicksburg being fifty dollars per thousand, yellow pine and cypress thirty dollars per thousand, and white pine seventy-five to eighty dollars per thousand; and further, that the lowest price at which coffins could be purchased there was $2 50 each.

The official statement of Colonel Moore, assistant quartermaster, shows that the petitioner fulfilled his contract in good faith; that the price stated in the contract was too low, and that it was carried out at a heavy loss.

The official statement of Colonel A. W. Wills sets forth his knowledge of the fact that the petitioner encountered the most earnest efforts of the common enemies of the country, and, in many instances, the efforts of unsuccessful bidders for the same contract, to prevent the fulfillment of the contract, in order that, in case of his failure, they might secure it. This officer further states that the erection of the fence at Corinth was done under most unfavorable circumstances, in addition to the foregoing, on account of the heavy rains which continued during nearly all the time the work was going on.

The official statement of Colonel S. R. Hamill, assistant quartermaster, sets forth the fact that he was acting chief quartermaster of the district of Tennessee when the contract was made; that the contract was spirited; that when the petitioner was awarded the contract bitter expressions of disappointment were made, and charges laid that he was too low to admit of its being faithfully carried out; but that the petitioner fulfilled it in a manner which established the fact of his determination to act in good faith, notwithstanding the unforeseen misfortunes which came upon him; that, as disbursing officer, said Hamill has knowledge of the fact that at times the Department was not in funds to pay the vouchers issued to the petitioner, and that he was compelled to sustain considerable losses to obtain the money due on the same whereby to carry on the work to completion; and closes with a recommendation that his application be favorably considered.

Upon a careful perusal and consideration of the sworn statements submitted in this case, and official certificates and indorsements of the military officers, the substance of which has been recited, your sub-committee find the following facts established:

1. That the petitioner made his proposal in good faith, and gave approved and sufficient bonds to fulfill his contract. (See paper —.)
2. That he at once entered upon the performance of it, employing a large amount of capital, and applying unusual energy and efforts in the work. (See paper —.)
3. That he endeavored to obtain necessary information so as to estimate the cost of the work, but that it fell short of the expense necessarily incurred in the execution of his contract. A condition of things was found to exist which the exercise of prudence or business judgment would not have anticipated, and that by reason of the combined opposition of unsuccessful bidders for the same contract, the hatred of the citizens hostile to him and to the purposes of his contract, the loss of his mill by fire, the malicious mischief of evil persons in breaking the machinery, the delays by flood, the damaging false reports of such persons as to his lack of integrity, pecuniary responsibility, and incompetency to fulfill his engagements, the usual obstacles to navigation of the rivers on which dependence was placed for transportation of materials to the designated places at which it was to be used, the overflow of water upon the ground in places where the fences were to be erected, and the underlying rock and the steep hills in other places, greatly adding to the estimated cost of the labor, the failure of the Government to pay promptly according to the contract, necessitating a sale of vouchers at a discount, and the borrowing of a large amount of money at high rates of interest, all combined against the constant endeavor of the petitioner, and rendered the fulfillment of his contract impossible without his incurring pecuniary loss.

It is shown by the proofs submitted that the memorialist fulfilled the contract as to the fences to the letter, (see papers marked 10; and 11.) By the same papers and No. 16 is also shown that he fulfilled the contract as to coffins, except in the matter of delivery of two lots at the time required, the reason for this failure being explained in papers Nos. 3, 5, 6, 14, 15, and 19, together with the indorsement of Major E. B. Whitman, supervisory quartermaster, Brigadier General Thomas Swords, assistant quartermaster general, and Major General George H. Thomas, on paper No. 1. It is conclusively established that the burning of his lumber mill and destruction of machinery, and a delay resulting from a flood, circumstances beyond his control or precaution, prevented him from furnishing the coffins ordered at Vicksburg and Memphis at the time the same were required, in the quantity of about twelve thousand at the first and eighteen hundred at the last-named point. Under the terms of the contract for this failure to deliver the coffins last referred to, others were procured by the Government at a cost of two dollars at Memphis and $2 50 at Vicksburg for each coffin. The difference between these prices and the price, ninety cents, for which the memorialist was to furnish the same amounts to $15,765, (see indorsement of General Swords, on paper No. 16,) and was charged to the memorialist. From this charge he cannot escape, except by an act of Congress for his relief. And in view of all the facts shown, your sub-committee respectfully recommend such relief to be granted.

The petitioner further prays that he may be paid an increased price for the work now finished and the coffins hereafter to be made and delivered under the contract at Vicksburg and Natchez, the most distant and expensive points, to indemnify him for all his necessary expenses incurred heretofore in the execution of it, and give him a reasonable compensation for the time, labor, and money invested in carrying on the work, and asks that such increase of price may be what the proofs adduced and a sense of justice may dictate. Upon this point your sub-committee has to observe as follows:

It would seem from the concurrent testimony of the officers of the quartermaster's department and of business men, (all acquainted with the markets in the localities where the contract calls for the supplies,) as to the price of lumber of the kinds specified in the contract, the condition of the ground on which the fence had to be erected, the unusual expense of navigation, because of the unprecedented condition of the streams, and all the material circumstances involved in the case, that the price stated in the contract was and is insufficient to reasonably compensate the petitioner (or any other party who might have undertaken the work) for the time, labor, and expense necessarily involved in the faithful fulfillment of the contract. Your sub-committee is therefore of the opinion that a fair and reasonable increase of price for the coffins would be eighty cents each, and for fence thirty cents per lineal foot, and that it ought to be made.

The Senate committee have compared this report with the evidence filed by the claimant, and find that it is substantially verified thereby. On this statement of the case the House proposed the joint resolution aforesaid, whereby it is proposed to relieve the said Palmer from all stoppages on account of his failure to deliver coffins under said contract, and to authorize and direct the adjustment and settlement of the further claim of the said Palmer for erecting fences around the national cemeteries by an additional allowance of $7,283 70, to be paid from the appropriation provided in act entitled "An act to establish and protect national cemeteries," approved February 22, 1867, but no allowance is made in said joint resolution to relieve the said Palmer for the difference between the contract price for said coffins and what it actually cost him to make and deliver them.

The number of coffins already delivered is about forty-three thousand. It is estimated that from fifteen to twenty thousand more will be required under the contract; say sixty thousand in all. The increase of price recommended by the foregoing report of the House committee for each coffin is eighty cents, which would make the aggregate amount of increase $48,000.

This committee are satisfied that Mr. Palmer is a man of integrity, and that he has, in good faith, industriously, earnestly, and with reasonable prudence, economy, and skill, endeavored to fulfill the obligation of his contract, and that, unless additional relief be granted to him beyond that provided in the joint resolution aforesaid, he will still suffer large pecuniary loss beside the loss of his time and labor. The nature of the case and facts connected with it render it impossible to ascertain with absolute certainty what that loss would be, but it is beyond a doubt that it would approximate the amount supposed by the committee of the House. The committee, therefore, recommend that the said joint resolution be so amended as to allow the said Palmer the sum of $20,000, (including the sum of $7,283 70, extra compensation for erecting fences around the national cemeteries,) and the committee report back the said joint resolution with an amendment accordingly.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I beg to inquire of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims, or, if he has not the measure in charge, of the honorable Senator from West Virginia, upon what principle it is that this $20,000 is to be paid, upon what principle of law or equity?

Mr. WILLEY. There is no principle of law upon which the payment could be required. It is simply a question on the facts addressing itself to the sense of equity of the Senate. The contract distinctly binds the contractor, Mr. Palmer, to deliver his coffins and to build his fence in a certain manner and within certain times and for certain prices. Mr. Palmer has been unable to do so, and in part the reasons why he has been unable to do so have been stated to the Senate by the reading of the report. He presented his petition to the other House for relief. The committee of the other House reported a joint resolution granting him relief to the extent of seven thousand and some odd hundred dollars for that part of his contract which referred to the erection of fences around the cemeteries, and gave him no relief whatever in regard to the claim which he sets up in his petition for the difference between the price which he had to pay for furnishing the coffins and the price for which he contracted to make and deliver them; but the House did this in that behalf; in consequence of the hinderance by the enemies of the country, by floods, and by fire, he was unable to deliver twelve thousand coffins at Vicksburg and eight hundred coffins at Memphis within the time specified in his contract and within the time required by the quartermaster's department, in consequence of which, under the provisions of his contract, the authorities deducted from what he was to get for the coffins which he had actually made the amount of $15,765. In consequence of the failure of Mr. Palmer to deliver these coffins in time the Government were required to make about thirteen thousand eight hundred coffins themselves, a large portion of which cost the Government, according to the proof of the Government's own officers, $2 50 each coffin; a part of them made out of old lumber belonging to the Government were made for two dollars per coffin. The contract price of these coffins was ninety cents per coffin. So the Senate will see that when the Government by its own means was compelled to make these coffins each one cost the Government $2 50 when made out of lumber the Government had to purchase, whereas by the contract of Mr. Palmer he was compelled to make and deliver them for ninety cents each.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there not an item here for damages?

Mr. WILLEY. I was going to state that by the terms of the contract the Government were authorized to withhold certain sums of money upon a failure on the part of Mr. Palmer to fulfill his contract, and these sums withheld are called, in the language of the War Department and of the bill reported by the House, "stoppages."

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amount?

Mr. WILLEY. The amount is $15,765; that was the price paid by the Government for the coffins which Mr. Palmer failed to make and deliver in time. The joint resolution from the House does relieve Mr. Palmer to that extent. It allows him to be paid in full for all the coffins he actually made at ninety cents per coffin; that is to say, it authorizes the quartermaster's department, notwithstanding the contract, to pay Mr. Palmer what they withheld by that stoppage for his non-delivery of those thirteen thousand eight hundred coffins. To that extent it relieves him; but for the other coffins, amounting to twenty-nine thousand, it afforded him no relief. Mr. Palmer now asks further relief in consequence of the facts set forth in this report—the hardships of the contract, his being prevented from fulfilling it in time by the hostility of the population in the country where he had to execute this contract to the purposes to which these coffins were to be dedicated, and to which these cemeteries were to be dedicated, that is, the care and sepulture of the dead who had fallen in the service of the country. In consequence of the hostility of the population which these acts excited against Mr. Palmer the result was the destruction of his mills and an attempt to destroy his credit and in every imaginable way to embarrass him in fulfillment of his contract. He seeks relief for the difference between what the coffins actually cost him and what he contracted to make and deliver them for.

He has already made and delivered forty-three thousand coffins, including what the Government had to make on account of his failure to deliver the thirteen thousand eight hundred in due time, leaving the number he actually made and delivered twenty-nine thousand two hundred, and he has made and delivered them at the price of ninety cents per coffin; that is, he will get ninety cents if this resolution passes, and the stoppage of $15,765 be allowed to be paid to him for them. Otherwise, he will have made his twenty-nine thousand coffins for ninety cents a coffin, and yet have deducted from the price of them $15,765, withheld by the Government on account of stoppages, so that he would get very little; scarcely anything at all. The House joint resolution proposed to relieve him of that embarrassment and difficulty; but if the Senate paid attention—and I was sorry they did not—to the facts specifically set forth in this report, the result of an elaborate and careful examination of the committee in the other House, and verified by the committee of this House by comparing the testimony filed in the case with the statements of the report itself, they would have seen that the contract is most unconscionable. The fact is proved by Mr. Hamill and the officers of the Government there, that when the Government had to make these coffins themselves they cost the Government $2 50 a coffin.

Mr. JOHNSON. What did they pay to other contractors?

Mr. WILLEY. There were no other contractors. The quartermaster's department itself procured lumber and employed its own mechanics, and when it did that, according to the testimony of Hamill, one of the officers of the Government, the coffins cost $2 50 apiece where the lumber was new, and making some of the coffins out of old lumber they cost two dollars; and yet Mr. Palmer, who, by his personal appearance and his personal conference with me, has given me a high idea of the man as a man of honor and patriotism, who has been striving in the utmost degree in his power faithfully to carry out his contract, will be compelled, under the unconscionable conditions of this contract, to deliver, as I understand from the best information I can get, about seventeen thousand coffins yet, at the inadequate price of ninety cents a coffin, and he is to be allowed only ninety cents for the twenty-nine thousand which he has already made. He is under bonds in the penalty of $80,000, and it will utterly ruin him.

I understand from my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. FOWLER,] who has some personal acquaintance with this gentleman, he being a constituent of his, and I have understood from other gentlemen, that Mr. Palmer is what he seems to be, a highminded and honorable man; and that he has the confidence of the Army any Senator may see who will examine this testimony. On the back of the petition itself is the autographic statement of General Thomas, who says that he has carefully read the within petition, and, from his knowledge of the facts, commends it to the favorable consideration of Congress. I was informed by Colonel STOKES, of the House of Representatives, that when Mr. Palmer, under the pressure of this contract, was about submitting to the penalties of his bond, when he found that he must necessarily be a ruined man anyhow, and proposed to throw up his contract, he was advised not to do so, because certainly the magnanimity and sense of honesty of the United States would not allow an honorable man, honestly struggling to fulfill his contracts, to be injured and to be utterly ruined; and upon the faith of such representations, and upon the suggestions of officers of the Army to whom he made the same proposition to throw up his contract, that he certainly would be indemnified and compensated if he would go on and fulfill it, he has struggled on and is struggling on. The House of Representatives, upon the evidence in the case, agreed to relieve him to the extent which they thought was necessary to afford some compensation for the deficiency of price.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator takes his seat allow me to ask him one question. Am I right in supposing that the bill contains three elements of compensation; first, seventy-two hundred and eighty-three dollars and some cents in reference to the fencing of cemeteries; second, $12,716 in reference to the unexecuted contract; and, third, the remittance of what are called stoppages, amounting to $15,765. Are those the three items?

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator is correct as to those three items?

Mr. CONKLING. That makes $35,000.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator is correct as to the items, but not exactly correct in his statement of the case.

Mr. CONKLING. I only described the items. Am I correct in the statement and description of the items?

Mr. WILLEY. Yes, sir; but—

Mr. DAVIS. Before the Senator from West Virginia proceeds allow me to say a word to the Senator from New York. I sustained this report in committee, and it is apparent that no man could have furnished the coffins that this man did in truth furnish at the remuneration which the committee allowed him by the report and make one dollar profit. It was because of the oppressive nature of the contract that I agreed to the report.

Mr. WILLEY. Allow me to state here that the absolute lumber which goes into a coffin will cost $1 11 besides the nails, besides the payment of the mechanic for making it, and besides the transportation from the place where it is made to the place where it is wanted.

The Senator from New York, I fear, does not understand the House joint resolution, especially as it proposes to relieve Mr. Palmer from the stoppages of $15,765. Those are simply stoppages, that much deducted out of the amount of the ninety cents per coffin on the coffins he has actually made. For instance, including what the Government has furnished and what Mr. Palmer has made, the whole number of coffins made up to the time this report was submitted was about forty-three thousand. Of that number the Government made, or had made for it otherwise than through Mr. Palmer, thirteen thousand eight hundred, for most of which the Government paid $2 50 per coffin, and for the residue two dollars. What those coffins cost the Government has been stopped by the War Department out of the compensation which Mr. Palmer was to get, out of the pay for the twenty-nine thousand coffins he made at ninety cents a coffin. That much money, therefore, is deducted from the pay actually due him for the work done. The provision of the joint resolution in that respect simply allows him to get the balance actually due, which would be very little in truth. The $15,875 is part of the price of the twenty-nine thousand coffins which he made at ninety cents per coffin.

The other branch of the relief provided for in the amendment to this joint resolution, $12,000, was not intended by the committee to be an increase of the price of the coffins he was yet to make, but it was to apply alike to what he has made and what he is still required to make. I understand he will be required to make from fifteen to seventeen thousand more, and it is to give him something like a reasonable, equitable compensation for the real bona fide honest service which he has rendered to the United States. I am satisfied that every Senator who will examine this testimony will come to the conclusion that, adding this amendment to this bill and passing it in that shape, Mr. Palmer must still be the sufferer and the loser from fifteen to twenty-five thousand dollars. You have only to make a calculation to show such to be the case. He says these coffins cost him two dollars per coffin, and he proves that they cost him that with his own materials and his own facilities of making them, so that the loss on each coffin he has made is $1 10, and if he is compelled to lose that much on each coffin that he is to make the sum will amount to $30,000.

Under all these circumstances I trust it will be the pleasure of the Senate to extend to this man this partial relief. As I said at first, he has no legal claim on the Government. His contract is specific, and if we are to hold him to the strict letter of the bond; if we are to say it is so nominated in the bond; if we say that we must have the pound of flesh, that and nothing less, this man must suffer, and he will suffer and be ruined by such action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will do a measure of justice to this man by passing this joint resolution. I would not detain the Senate but for the fact that I know Mr. Palmer and know his character and standing very well. At the beginning of the war he was a fellow lawyer and a judge of the court of common pleas in the State of Ohio. He raised two companies of men in that State for a force with which I was perfectly familiar. I knew him personally and intimately at that time. He went off and became a citizen of the State of Tennessee. I knew him to be an earnest, honest man. He engaged in a contract which, on the face of it, seems to be a foolish one, at an insufficient price. He agreed to deliver forty or fifty thousand coffins at ninety cents apiece. It seems from the testimony, which is spread out at great length in this report, that it was utterly impossible for any man to comply literally with the terms of that contract. The result is that, on account of the burning of his mills and the inability to perform the contract, he could not supply in some places the coffins demanded, and the quartermasters had coffins made at the Government expense, costing $2 50 each, and they deducted the loss thus sustained by the Government from the price of those he actually delivered. He delivered about forty-three thousand coffins at ninety cents each, for which he was to receive about forty thousand dollars, and it is proposed to take from the amount coming to him the loss and damage caused by his inability to comply with his contract, so that he will be ruined by the operation. This man is engaged in a patriotic duty, displaying great ability, great zeal, and great fidelity. He is a man of great energy; I know him personally; a man of pure character, who entered into this matter from the best of motives. He is likely to be ruined by the Government enforcing against him a hard contract. It seems to me that it is a case for the equitable relief which Congress alone can render.

As for enforcing against him these stoppages, that I think would not be done in any court of justice; because the fact that he did all that any man could do to execute the contract would be sufficient in a court of law or equity to prevent a literal enforcement of the contract. Having done all that any man could possibly do, no more should be required of him.

The $7,000 proposed to be allowed to him for the additional expenses incurred in making the fences around the cemeteries is a perfectly proper item; because it seems from the report that he encountered difficulties not contemplated at the time the contract was made; that in certain cases they had to dig post holes through to the rock, the ground not being firm enough to put iron bolts down, and the expense was increased by unexpected events—a condition of facts that was not contemplated by either party when the contract was made. In a case of this kind a court of equity would give relief on the ground that new facts not known to either party had occurred.

The only disputed item there can be is the additional allowance proposed by our committee of some twelve thousand dollars to insure the future completion of the contract. In my judgment that is a beneficial provision for the United States. There are some seventeen thousand of these coffins yet to be delivered. If he is allowed to deliver them at ninety cents each, they will cost the Government, including the $12,000, about a dollar and a half each; but if he is unable to carry out the contract by the passage of this measure, the Government will have to supply those coffins at $2 50 each.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will state to the Senator from Ohio, that it was on that principle, because it was a good arrangement for the Government, that the committee proposed the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. So it strikes me. I know nothing about the facts of this case except what I find in the report, and I should not have said a word in regard to it but that I happen to know Mr. Palmer. I was rather surprised that he got into a contract of this kind by which he agreed to make coffins at ninety cents. It seems to me on the whole the arrangement proposed by the committee is a fair one, and I hope the Senate will pass the joint resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. I will make a remark that, perhaps, will explain to the Senator from Ohio why the contract was made by this gentleman.

I am well aware that Major Palmer is better known to the Senators from Ohio than he is to me. He was formerly a citizen of Ohio. He came to the State of Tennessee with the Army. He was a good soldier. As has been stated by the Senator from Ohio, he is an earnest, energetic, intelligent gentleman. He purchased property in a portion of the country that was not at all congenial to his sentiments. It was a very unfortunate location for his property. He has always had difficulty in doing anything on his farm. He owned a portion of land that was covered with a very excellent quality of timber well adapted to this purpose. He erected saw mills there, and by having such a vast quantity of timber and fine mills he was enabled to furnish lumber cheaper than it could be purchased at any other place, so that this contract was simply a means of enabling him to sell his lumber.

As I said, however, his farm was located in a section of country where there was a great deal of violence of feeling—unusually so. It was in a county in which there was not a solitary vote given for the Union in 1861; and perhaps there is as much violence of feeling there as in any portion of the State of Tennessee or in any portion of the South. His mills were burned down, and he was unable to use his timber as he had expected to use it in fulfilling this contract, so that he was forced to go into the market and purchase lumber at as high rates as other people, and he was unable to fulfill his contract, and I think would have been unable to supply coffins at ninety cents, even if he had not met with the misfortunes to which I have alluded.

I believe every Senator knows well enough that ninety cents is no price for a coffin. I do not think there is a Senator here who would expect Mr. Palmer or any other man to fulfill a contract of that kind. It was certainly a very great exaction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why did he make such a contract?

Mr. FOWLER. I do not know, unless it was for the reasons I have stated. I can only say that I should not have made such a contract. But, under the circumstances, if he could have manufactured his timber on his own premises he might not have lost so much by it. He undoubtedly meant in good faith to fulfill the contract; and of my own personal knowledge I can say that he has used almost superhuman exertions to fulfill it. No man ever put forth greater efforts than he has done for that purpose. The proof of that fact is before the committee. For my part, I do not think the committee have allowed him anything like equity in the case. I do not suppose there is a Senator who will examine the facts of the case throughout who will hesitate to award him this small amount of money in order to save him from utter ruin.

He is a temperate man; he pays good attention to everything that he does; he knows the way to accomplish results; he has acted upon economical principles; there has been no extravagance whatever in his expenditures; every effort that he could employ in order to conduct this business in the most economical manner has been put forth. I know personally that General Thomas feels very much interest in this case, and is perfectly aware that Major Palmer will lose largely by the operation—not only enough to ruin him, but his securities also, unless some relief be extended.

The case has been presented by the committee; it is unnecessary to go over the facts. I have merely mentioned the points which I have stated in order to explain the circumstances that induced him to make the contract in the first place; and it must be borne in mind that he has not had an opportunity of meeting his expectations, because when his mills were burned down he could no longer secure timber from his own farm.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President—

Mr. MORGAN. I ask my colleague to give way. It is very evident that this bill cannot be passed to-day, and I desire now to move an executive session in accordance with the understanding of the Senate yesterday.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope not. Let us pass the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. The understanding yesterday was that my colleague should have an executive session early to-day, and I do not feel at liberty to object to it. I want to submit some suggestions about this bill. It concerns a number of my constituents to know what the rule in these cases is, and I want to state a case or two to the Senate, to be put along with this, as I expect to derive a good deal of light from what shall be done in Mr. Palmer's case. As I have no doubt it will take some time, I yield to my colleague to make his motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope that motion will not be carried.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not rise to debate it. I only rose to express my wish that it would not be carried, and that is allowable on all occasions of the kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 14, noes 14.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Conkling, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, McCroery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomerooy, Ross, Salsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Williams, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fowler, Frolinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Willey—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Sprague, and Yates—13.

So the motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of St. Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana.

Also, that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 475) to extend the charter of Washington city; also to regulate the selection of officers and for other purposes; and a joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) authorizing the Secretary of State to adjust certain claims and directing the payment thereof; in both of which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House all the facts and circumstances connected with the mortgage held by the United States on the said steamship Atlantic, and the reasons why the said sale of the said steamship has been postponed for so long a time; where the said steamship now is, what is her present condition and value, and whether or not in his judgment the Government will realize from the sale of said steamship the amount now due on the mortgage; and further, whether the said steamship was chartered by the United States during the rebellion, and if so, for what period and upon what terms, and if any portion of the charter money was deducted to be applied to the claim of the United States, and if not why not.

No objection was made, and the preamble and resolution were adopted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled, a bill (H. R. No. 881) refunding duties paid under protest on the importation from France of a bell donated for the use of St. Mary's Institute and Notre Dame University, Indiana; when the Speaker signed the same.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask consent to offer a resolution, which I think the Speaker will rule to be privileged, when it shall have been read. The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, passed February 24, 1868, and the proceedings of this House amendatory thereof, or supplemental thereto, be, and the same are hereby rescinded, and that the managers be recalled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that this resolution is not privileged at this time, and for this reason: the House is now acting under the previous question, which was pending at the adjournment on the 31st of March. The House at that time had under consideration a resolution reported by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAFLIN,] from the Committee on Printing, to print an extra number of copies of the argument of Manager BUTLER. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] to lay the resolution on the table was voted down; the previous question was seconded, and the pending question now is "Shall the main question be now put?" and no other business is now in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of citizens of Kendall and Maverick counties, western Texas, for a division of said State.

Also, a remonstrance of the State Central committee representing the Union men of North Carolina, against disabilities being removed from John S. Short, Martin county, North Carolina.

Also, a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that the building known as the old post office may be rented to them, to be used as a public exchange, &c.

By Mr. COOK: The petition of citizens of Maryland, for the passage of House bill No. 420, for the incorporation of the Washington and Maryland Railroad Company.

By Mr. FERRISS: The petition of George Cronkrite and others, soldiers of the war of 1812, for further pension of eight dollars per month.

Also, the petition of S. F. Vilas and others, stockholders of the Second National Bank of Plattsburg, for leave to change the name of said bank to The Vilas National Bank of Plattsburg.

By Mr. GROVER: A memorial of more than 100 oil refiners and other business men of Jefferson county, Kentucky, including the city of Louisville, praying a repeal of the law taxing refined petroleum.

By Mr. RAUM: The petition of G. W. Cochran, on behalf of himself and the other stockholders of the City National Bank of New Orleans, for the name of said bank to be changed to the Germania National Bank of New Orleans.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. R. FULLER, D. D., of Baltimore, Maryland.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As all legislative business is suspended, nothing remains but for the chair to be vacated that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may preside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore thereupon vacated the chair, and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore resumed the chair at eighteen minutes to four o'clock p. m.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not susceptible of argument.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to state—

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

Mr. THAYER. Very well.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Grimes, Howard, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Vickers—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—35.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Fowler, Howe, and Saulsbury—5.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the understanding of last week is still in force, in reference to business by the House?

The SPEAKER. That understanding will continue in force, unless otherwise ordered, until the close of the impeachment trial; that is, that unless the Speaker gives notice at the opening of the day's session that there will probably be business for the consideration of the House none will be transacted when the Committee of the Whole return to the Hall.

IMPROVEMENT OF UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the chief of engineers, with the report of Major General G. K. Warren, of the engineer corps, on the survey and improvement of the Upper Mississippi river and tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTH AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHANLER. I have some resolutions which I desire to offer. If, after they shall have been read, no objection is made, I will ask action upon them now; otherwise, I will consent to their reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House it is the duty of this Government to take prompt and vigorous measures to reconcile the nations of South America now at war.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to appoint a special mission to Brazil, Bolivia, Uruguay, and Paraguay for this purpose.

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform this House what efforts he may have already made to reconcile the parties to the war now raging between those countries.

Mr. KELSEY. I think those resolutions should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CHANLER. Very well.

The resolutions were accordingly referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FERRY for ten days.

Leave of absence was also granted to Mr. BLAIR for two weeks.

DELANO VS. MORGAN.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House that the Ohio contested-election case of Delano vs. Morgan be deferred until the 7th day of May next, by which time the minority will be prepared to report on the case. I desire further to state the reason I make that request of the House is this: on account of business which duty compels me to attend to I ask leave to be absent about three weeks. I will have to leave for Indiana to-day to be absent about three weeks. I will not be able by any possible effort to make the report before my departure or until after my return. The case involves more than two thousand pages of testimony, all of which has to be examined, and it is altogether one of the most complicated and laborious cases ever passed upon by a committee of the House. I ask this as a matter of justice to parties interested in the contest, and as a matter of kindness to myself.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will have no serious objection to the case being continued until the 1st day of May, and if the gentleman from Indiana shall not be prepared at that time, I will be glad to have the committee have an opportunity to report and the report acted upon at the earliest possible time.

Mr. KERR. I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the 1st day of May comes on Friday. The 4th of May will be Monday. I could not well get here by any effort before the 4th of May, and then I would have only two or three days to make the report in. I ask that time in which to prepare the report, and I agree that it shall be done by that time.

Mr. MAYNARD. When does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose to report in the Kentucky and Missouri cases?

The SPEAKER. Let us dispose of the pending case first.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will not consent to a further extension beyond the 1st day of May. If that is not satisfactory to the gentleman from Indiana, if he cannot consent to that time, and thinks that he will not be prepared with his report on that day, I now give notice that I will call the case up for the action of the House at the first opportunity which may be afforded to me.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not think the acting chairman of the Committee of Elections heard the reason assigned by our colleague from Indiana for asking a further extension of time in the case of Delano vs. Morgan. I think the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was drawn off at the time the gentleman from Indiana made his explanation. I hope he will listen to it again.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I did not hear all the gentleman had to say, but I supposed he informed me in private of all that he stated publicly.

Mr. KERR. I explained it fully to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. On consultation with some who take an interest in the case I have stated the best I could do if it depends upon me to make any arrangement about it.

Mr. KERR. I cannot consent to the 1st day of May for the reason that I know I cannot prepare the report by that time.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I give notice to the House, then, that I will call the case up at the earliest opportunity the House is ready to act upon it.

Mr. KERR. Is it in order to submit my request to the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not, for the reason that there is a question of privilege now pending on the printing of forty thousand copies of Manager BUTLER'S speech.

Mr. KERR. Then I understand that any time is refused.

NATIONAL FORCES.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1001) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HENRY C. TYLER.

Mr. WOODWARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1002) for the relief of Henry C. Tyler; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

M. B. BRADY AND COMPANY.

Mr. TWICHELL. I ask unanimous consent to lay before the House a communication of M. B. Brady & Co., asking for the privilege of selling in the lobby of the House photographs of the impeachment managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know whether the managers have any interest in the sale of these pictures. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House made during the last Congress, the Chair is not at liberty to assign any table or desk or stand for the sale of any article whatever in this part of the Capitol. It is under the control of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the managers have any interest in this I hope the House will give unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Door-keeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: the Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at three o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the abolition of the internal tax on refined petroleum.

By Mr. DONNELLY: A memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in relation to General Warren's report upon the subject of the survey and improvement of the Mississippi river above Rock Island and of the Minnesota river.

Also, a memorial, in relation to the establishment of a mail route from Waseca to Albert Lea.

There are several executive communications, and a variety of other matters which have accumulated upon the table of the Speaker, and which should be disposed of by reference to committees, &c. In order, however, not to delay the Senate, the Chair will defer laying them before the House until after the return of the Committee of the Whole to the Hall of the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suppose no other business will then be transacted.

The SPEAKER. None but that of which the Chair has just given notice.

Mr. BANKS. That ought to come to us through the proper executive department.

The SPEAKER. If there be objection the Chair will withdraw it.

Mr. BANKS. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed; and as it is interesting in giving the history of the origin of the troubles in Crete the translation will be printed in the Globe.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The paper is as follows:

To Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

HONORABLE SIR: We have the honor to forward you the inclosed document, begging that you would be pleased to arrange for its reading before the members of the honorable body over which you preside, and inform us of the result.

In anticipation of your goodness to comply with our request, we take this opportunity to express to you our gratitude.

We remain with the highest respect the members of the National Assembly of the Provisional Government of Crete.

To the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: During the Greek revolution of 1821 the Cretans fought for nine long years—this is, a year more than the rest of the Greeks.

They fought not only the armies of the Sultan, but also those of Mahomet Ali, the viceroy of Egypt.

When the three allied Powers undertook to establish peace between Greece and Turkey the Cretans had in their power not only the whole country, but also the two forts, namely, that of Kissamos and of Grambousa, which were the strongest, while the Turks held only three other forts, namely, Chania, Rethimnos, and Heracleum. Yet the Cretans were deemed unworthy of the liberty for which their country had been desolated and half of their number slain.

The allied Powers, not satisfied with condemning the Cretans to the most abject slavery, forced them also to give up the fort of Grambousa, which they held. The only change made in the fortunes of the Christians of Crete was a change of masters. They were transferred from the yoke of the Sultan to that of Mahomet Ali, viceroy of Egypt. They promised solemnly that they would protect the Christians from all acts of lawlessness and oppression from the Turkish Government, and that they would aid them in the amelioration of their future state.

The new yoke to which the Cretans were now subjected, although less oppressive as regards personal liberty, was more galling in its system of taxation. The viceroy endeavored to enforce at Crete the same cruel measures which were already operating in Egypt.

Such measures, however, became insupportable to the Cretans, who had suffered everything during the war of independence; therefore in 1833 they assembled, unarmed, outside of Chania, in order to draw up a petition whereby they might express, respectfully, their complaints to the local authorities. The wily governor, by false promises, succeeded in persuading the people to disperse, and then seized about seventy of the leading men, whom he hung on the olive trees in the village of Mourines.

The Cretans, depressed by the cruelties and injustice of the viceroy, and seeing no practical fulfillment of the promises made by the allies, embraced the first opportunity, when the Sultan and Mahomet Ali were at war in 1841, to resort once again to arms.

But alas! some of the great Powers interfered in behalf of the Sultan, while two others, disagreeing among themselves, caused even this effort to fail. One wished to see Crete a principality and the other desired to see it attached to Greece. After this the Cretans were once again subjected to the yoke of the Sultan, and the oppression which they have since suffered from the different governors appointed by the Sultan is beyond description.

The Cretans being naturally a freedom-loving people could not long bear such servitude, therefore, in 1858, they made another more cautious effort for relief. They assembled quietly, without arms, and drew up a petition to the Sultan, begging to be relieved from the oppressive system of taxation, and from other abuses to which they had been subjected. The Sultan, in order to quiet them, granted to the Cretans, by vague edicts, certain privileges, namely, that they should have courts, the members of which were to be elected by the inhabitants; that the municipal officers also were to be chosen by the people; also, taxes were regulated and agreed upon. But while these privileges were on the one hand granted, on the other they were allowed to be violated in the most shameful manner. Neither the courts nor the municipal officers were ever elected freely by the people, but, instead, they were compelled to accept such candidates as were recommended by the Pasha. The testimony of Christians was also rejected at court, and those injured could seldom obtain justice.

These acts of treachery forced the people to resort to almost desperate measures. Many of the less intelligent, though fondly attached to the religion of their fathers, were almost induced to accept the propositions of the agents of popery, who, taking advantage of the people's distress, urged them to recognize the Pope as the head of the Church, promising that, by this step, they would secure the powerful protection of Rome. The Papal agents so represented the case to the people as to make them think that such an acknowledgment would in no way interfere with their own belief. But even this measure has failed, inasmuch as the Sublime Porte hastened to declare that it would, on no account, respect such a protection.

Rome, by the way, had never held out to the people any such inducements, while the people by this time had begun to see that such a recognition would reflect on their own faith.

The evils which the Cretans suffered were not limited to taxation and the non-execution of justice, but extended to the most lawful and simple wishes of the people.

1. The Government refused to repair roads which had become dangerous for travelers.
2. Oil could not be landed at any port except those under the forts, and so the farmer was compelled to make long and dangerous journeys.
3. They were denied commercial banks where the farmer might borrow money at a regulated rate, and thus be delivered from the extortion of the avaricious oil merchant who invariably secured the oil at less than half its value.

4. They were refused common schools, so indispensable to their prosperity, although the people proposed to defray all expenses.
5. The personal liberties of Christian subjects were disregarded, and persons seized and held as prisoners at the pleasure and caprice of the local authorities.
6. Public taxes were increased to such an extent that the tax was often above the value of the product.
7. The Government forbade all private enterprise in the manufacture of salt, and compelled the people to purchase from the Government at one franc per oke.

These, and many other acts of oppression which we omit to enumerate at present, compelled the people to assemble in May, 1866, in the province of Cydonia, and there draw up another petition expressing their complaints most respectfully to the Sublime Porte, begging it especially that they might be allowed the privileges once granted to them.

The Sultan, after three months' silence, replied to them through the local authorities, condemning the movement and requesting them to disperse, threatening that in case they refused he would disperse them by force, which evidently was being prepared during this period of silence.

The Cretans, now losing all hope of ever receiving redress, and seeing at the same time some Christians imprisoned without cause and others secretly murdered, decided as a last resort to take up arms and thus defend their rights and their lives. Soon after, through a General Assembly, chosen at the outset, the Cretans declared their purpose of throwing off the yoke of the Sultan, and took for their watchword "Union with Greece or death."

Such, in brief, is the history of the beginning of the present struggle between the Cretan Christians and the Turks.

A year and a half is nearly gone, and the inhumanities practiced by the Turks against the Christians are beyond description.

They have burned the Christian's dwelling and his harvests of corn, plundered his property, hewn down his orchards, profaned his churches, abused even his cemeteries by exhuming the dead and scattering them everywhere that they might become the prey of crows and dogs. They have butchered in cold blood the innocents, ravished in a most fiendish manner the gentle and harmless, tortured the strong, and committed other acts of barbarity in order to gratify their passions; in short, they have been guilty of atrocities as yet unwritten in the annals of the world. Some of these acts are recorded by name and with particulars in the inclosed copies of "The Hellas," and in the future we will provide you with a list of the pecuniary losses suffered thus far by the Christians, as measures have already been taken to ascertain the facts from official and reliable sources.

The Cretans, however, have not only to contend against the evils already mentioned, but also against hunger and nakedness, which have cut down thousands of men, women, and children. Yet in spite of all this they are determined to suffer anything rather than submit again to the yoke of such a fearful despotism.

In order that they may more effectually fight the common enemy of their country, they have taken measures to transport those whom they love to free Greece.

No one can foresee the extent or degree of sufferings and losses to which they will be subjected in future, as they have no adequate means of support; they have not the fleet needed to dislodge the Turks from the forts where they are fortified. The whole island, except the forts and some entrenchments, is in the hands of the Christians, and this is the reason why the provincial officers, lately appointed by the Grand Vizier, cannot reach their destination at the seat of their respective provinces.

The Cretans have often represented their sufferings and appealed for aid to the great Powers of Europe, but as yet no effective measures have been taken in their behalf. This is owing greatly to the differences of opinion and jealousies among those Powers, not, as some suppose, to the obstacles presented in consequence of the Mohammedan population of the island.

In case Crete becomes free, all the inhabitants, both Christian and Turk, will be treated alike and will enjoy the same privileges; besides, the Mohammedan Cretans, amounting to fifty or sixty thousand souls, are from Christian parentage, and it is very likely that most, if not all of them, will return to their father's faith. We believe that even to-day, if they were not shut up in forts and placed under guard, they would declare themselves in sympathy with the Christians and against the Turkish Government, which they hate and publicly curse on account of the many evils which they have suffered.

Finally, the Cretans appeal to the United States of America, and beg them:

1. To recognize the Provisional Government of Crete.
2. To pledge the moral and material support of the noble and freedom-loving people from whom they have already received many tokens of sympathy.
3. To give their protection, in order to secure the complete emancipation and independence of the island.
4. Especially that the United States ambassador at Constantinople be instructed to cooperate with the ambassador of those European Powers which are active with the Sublime Porte in behalf of Crete.

Would that it were written in the records of Divine Providence that the people of the United States had assisted in the emancipation of the freedom-loving but oppressed people of Crete—the mother of ancient civilization; by such an act a new luster would be added to the glory which they already enjoy in both hemispheres.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gives notice that on the return of the House to the Hall this afternoon the Chair will lay before the House certain executive communications, &c., in order not to delay the Senate by presenting them at the present time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In view of the order which has been adopted by the House, and in further view of legislation which may become necessary, I now give notice that on Thursday next I shall move a call of the House. I give this notice now so that members who are absent may return by that time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean that he will move a call of the House after the return of the House to the Hall from the Senate?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. On Thursday next, yes.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to give notice that if any business is transacted I shall insist upon the action of the House upon the bill relating to the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

The SPEAKER. That bill will be the unfinished business before the House, as soon as the resolution in regard to printing the argument of Manager BUTLER shall have been disposed of.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I shall object to any business being done unless there is a quorum of the House present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ascertain that by calling for a division upon any question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to have referred to the Committee on Printing a resolution in relation to the argument made by the counsel for the President, Mr. CURTIS, similar to the resolution now pending in relation to the argument of Manager BUTLER.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent, pending the consideration of the other resolution.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. There will be business to be transacted upon the return of the House to this Hall.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

EIGHTY-FOURTH NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House, relative to the eighty-fourth New York volunteers having received only fifty dollars additional bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the journal of the fourth Legislature of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

LINCOLN MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received the following invitation:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1868.

The committee having in charge the order of ceremonies request the honor of the presence of Mr. Speaker Colfax, members and officers of the House, on the occasion of unveiling and dedicating the statue of the late President Abraham Lincoln, now being erected by the citizens of Washington in front of the City Hall, on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 15th instant, at two o'clock.

RICHARD WALLACH, Chairman.

CROSBY S. NOYES, Secretary.

The House will be probably engaged in its duties at the bar of the Senate on Wednesday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the Speaker return the proper answer to the invitation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Expressing our regret, and declining it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will understand that as the order of the House.

Mr. RAUM. Why cannot a committee be appointed by the Speaker to accept this invitation on the part of the House, and to be present at this ceremony?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to my colleague to let it remain with the Speaker what answer to send.

The SPEAKER. Members will understand that they are invited and can be present at the hour of two o'clock Wednesday afternoon next.

ARGUMENT OF MANAGER BUTLER.

Mr. GARFIELD. In accordance with the notice I gave this morning I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the pending question. On the 30th of March the House seconded the previous question on a resolution reported from the Committee on Printing for the printing of forty thousand copies of the speech of Manager BUTLER in opening the case for the House on the trial of the President. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANTLER] moved that the resolution be laid on the table, which motion was rejected; and the question now recurs on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. So I suppose. I had drawn it up as an independent resolution, but propose to submit it now as an amendment to the pending resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House forty thousand copies of the opening argument of the President's counsel, Judge Curtis.

The SPEAKER. Even unanimous consent could not make that in order; and for this reason: by law to be found in the Statutes-at-Large, volume nine, (incorporated in the Digest, not now before the Chair,) every proposition for printing extra numbers of any document whatever must be referred to the Committee on Printing; and it has been decided that no amendment and no unanimous consent can waive it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The Senate frequently amends a bill of the House for raising revenue, and on the same principle this might be amended.

The SPEAKER. That is the constitutional right of the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the vote on the pending resolution be delayed, and this resolution of mine be referred to the Committee on Printing, so they may report on both cases at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The committee have already reported upon one subject. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] now asks unanimous consent that the resolution just read may be introduced and referred to the Committee on Printing.

No objection was made; and the resolution submitted by Mr. ELDRIDGE was accordingly received and referred.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The proposition, as stated by the Chair, was not the precise proposition for which I asked unanimous consent. I desire that both resolutions go to the Committee on Printing, in order that they may come before the House together for action.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman desires to have the pending resolution recommitted to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is what I ask.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent pending the previous question.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Gentlemen must see that this resolution cannot go through. There is no quorum now present.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is, "Shall the main question be now put?"

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. As there is no quorum present I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. MAYNARD: A memorial of the Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad Company, of Texas, praying for a grant of public lands and a loan of United States bonds, to aid in constructing a continuous line of railroad and telegraph from Jefferson, in Texas, to San Diego, in California, by the way of El Paso, with authority to make such railroad connections as to reach San Francisco, Guayamas, Memphis, and Virginia City, on the harbor of Norfolk, in Virginia, or any other point on the Atlantic coast, and Washington city, under the title of the Southern Transcontinental railroad.

By Mr. STARKWEATHER: The petition of H. S. Bedet and 100 others, citizens of New London, Connecticut, for the repeal of the special tax on petroleum.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana: The claim of George Memasin, for loss of horse, &c.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 14, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be vacated, that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may preside.

The President pro tempore thereupon vacated the chair, and the Senate proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of President Johnson.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at twelve o'clock and nineteen minutes p. m.

IMPEACHMENT RULES.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to give notice of my purpose to offer an additional rule to the rules of practice and proceeding in cases of impeachment. I ask that the Clerk read it.

The Secretary read the additional rule proposed to the rules of practice and proceeding in cases of impeachment, as follows:

Two thirds of the Senators present shall be necessary to rule any question of evidence or law against the party impeached.

JOURNAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal of yesterday will be read.

The Secretary read the Journal of yesterday's legislative session.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary for the Territory of New Mexico, transmitting, in conformity with a joint resolution of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory, copies of acts passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico at its last session which were disapproved by the Governor of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented the journals of the fourth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona for the session begun on the 4th day of September and ended on the 7th day of October, A. D. 1867, at Prescott; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORT OF IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE,] to print five thousand copies of the report of the impeachment trial, have instructed me to report back the same without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

No objection being made, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, at the close of the pending impeachment trial, five thousand copies of the report thereof, in addition to the number of copies thereof heretofore ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island whether this is printed at the Public Printing Office?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it also printed at the Congressional Globe office?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not in pamphlet form.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do we pay for it as part of the Congressional Globe?

Mr. ANTHONY. We pay the Congressional Globe for the proceedings in the Congressional Globe, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit, then, that this is a double expenditure that ought not to be incurred. The Globe has got to be a mammoth, monstrous, overgrown affair. At any rate it is very expensive, costing far more than Senators dream of. Now, to pay for this trial in the Globe, and then to pay for it at our own printer's, doubling the composition, is an unnecessary expenditure. I think it ought not to be published in the Globe, if published in the other form.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator certainly would not have the Globe deficient in the most interesting proceedings we have had for years. It is necessary that the record in the Globe should be perfect, I suppose. The trial is printed in the Globe, and then this is printed in this octavo form.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask why publish these extra copies at the Government Printing Office, which is already overburdened with printing. Why not direct these to be supplied at the Globe office?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will allow me to suggest that we do precisely the same thing in reference to the President's message. It is printed in the Globe, but we order extra copies. So the reports of the heads of Departments are printed in the Globe, but we order extra copies. As a matter of course the proceedings of this trial must go into the Globe; but it is very essential that we should have these impeachment proceedings in a separate form. We all want them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to that is, that nothing is printed in the Congressional Globe except the bare message necessary to explain the debate, while all the accompanying documents are published at the Government Printing Office, and there alone. If we are to make the Congressional Globe a vast depository for all the proceedings of Congress and all the proceedings on the trial of impeachments, and then publish the trial again at our own Government Printing Office, it seems to me we are doubling the expense. The law for the publication of the Globe expires on the 4th of March next, and then we shall get rid of it; but it seems to me it is hardly worth while to double this expenditure. If these proceedings are published in the Government Printing Office, there is no necessity for printing them in the Globe; or if they are published in the Globe, there put in type, we may as well order from the Globe office the requisite number of copies without going to this double expense.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio certainly would not leave out of the Globe, which contains the proceedings of Congress for a great many years, all about this trial; and we surely must have the proceedings in this impeachment case separately so that each Senator can examine them without going to the Daily Globe. We have already ordered that, and it is now only a question about extra numbers, as I understand, which will not be a very expensive matter. I do not know what the cost will amount to; I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Printing can tell us; but it seems to me it would be a very strange proceeding to strike from the publication of our proceedings in the Congressional Globe this great trial. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, this publication will cost only the expense of printing and of the paper; the type is all set, and the cost will of course be very immaterial. We must be of opinion, and I suppose the whole country is of the same opinion, that this trial should go into the hands of the public generally. That cannot be done by circulating the Globe. They would hardly be able to read it in the Globe if they got it. The number of copies of the Globe we shall have will not enable us to distribute them at all to the public generally. The Committee on Printing, therefore, had no doubt that it was but a reasonable request on the part of those who made the suggestion that the number of copies of this publication should be increased as proposed by the committee.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether the edition which is laid on our tables daily is printed at the Government Printing Office or at the Globe office, and whether this is the one of which it is proposed now to print extra copies?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is printed at the Government Printing Office, and it is the edition of which the committee propose to order additional copies. The Senator from Ohio will understand that this does not double the expense. The reporting for this edition of course costs nothing. This report is taken from the Globe, and it is kept back one day, allowing an opportunity for revision, which is a matter of considerable consequence if there be any errors or mistakes, as there are more likely to be in taking down testimony than anything else, although the reporters of the Globe in the Senate never make mistakes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do not get the Globe early enough.

Mr. ANTHONY. It can be got by sending for it. The Globe would be laid on our desks every morning, but for the fact that, as I understand, the Presiding Officer thought it not proper to allow newspapers on our desks during the trial, and, therefore, they have not been allowed to be brought in. We can have the Globe here every morning with the proceedings of the day before, and the following morning we have this edition in which there has been an opportunity for revision. The additional expense is only in setting up the type. That is something, of course, and perhaps considerable more than the committee would think of incurring in ordinary cases; but it seemed to the committee that this was a matter of very grave importance, and that if we print anything we ought to print this.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman whether the Government Printing Office is printing in pamphlet form now what the reporter of the Globe takes down—all the proceedings.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly, this is copied from the Globe.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is that done under any order made by the Senate on that subject?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, it is done under an order made by the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then there is no difference whether it be printed in the Globe or at the Government Printing Office, as far as expense is concerned.

Mr. ANTHONY. The form of the page that is used in the Globe would be inconvenient, ill adapted to a book, and the type is too fine to be conveniently read. The Senator, by comparing the type of this book with the type of the Globe, will see the difference.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the Senate have ordered five thousand copies of this edition already.

Mr. ANTHONY. That has been already ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. And the question now is whether we shall order five thousand more.

Mr. ANTHONY. Exactly; and there are three hundred pages now kept standing in type in anticipation of this order. The printer wants to distribute that type if we do not pass this order, and hence it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. POMEROY. As we have already provided for printing five thousand, this resolution will only involve the additional cost necessary to print five thousand more from the same type.

Mr. ANTHONY. Merely the cost of the paper and press-work, and I suppose the paper and press-work will cost less at the Government Printing Office than at any other establishment; so that, perhaps, it will cost, after all, not much to print it in this form, which is much more desirable, at the Government Printing Office, than it would be to make a contract with the Globe to print it from their type. Of course they would be entitled to a profit on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Five thousand copies have been already ordered. Now, what is the use of incurring the expenditure of at least $5,000 more? It is a very small item, to be sure; but what is the use of incurring that expense to supply persons with free books when they can buy them, if they please, at the Congressional Globe office?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is for the Senate to judge; they have had the whole story.

Mr. DRAKE. As I offered this resolution I will say a word about it. I do not think that Congress will have during this session any document to send forth to the country which the people of the country will be more desirous to see than the report of this trial. It will be, to be sure, in the Congressional Globe; but very few persons in any State will see the Congressional Globe. By printing five thousand additional copies of the book in the form in which it is laid upon our tables here every day there will be just that number more sent among the people of the country to let them see what their Senators and Representatives have been doing upon this occasion; and as it will cost to put them forth only the additional expense of paper and press-work and binding, I submit that we cannot, in my judgment, make any better expenditure of money in printing than to provide for these additional copies to go abroad among the people, and let them see what we have been doing in reference to this great transaction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I dislike to detain the Senate in regard to a matter of this kind; but we know that the proceedings of this trial are published now in hundreds of thousands of sheets daily in full, and they are read by the people.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not in full,

Mr. SHERMAN. Substantially in full. I have seen in the western papers and in the New York papers very full and complete reports, just as much as the people are willing to read, just as much as they are willing to demand. The proceedings are also published complete in the Congressional Globe, and become a part of the records of the country in the most permanent form, where they will be enduring, where the people in future ages may resort to see all that has been done during the trial. Now, it is proposed, having ordered five thousand copies of this work, to publish five thousand more for free distribution among our constituents. It is true the expense of it may not be large; probably $10,000 would cover it. If the trial should fill two or three volumes, as I presume it will, it will cost probably $10,000. That may not be a very large sum, but still it is so much wasted, given away.

Mr. DRAKE. It will not cost half that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what it will cost. Can the Senator from Rhode Island give us an idea of how much it will probably cost?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can generally give an idea of the cost of a document, but not of this, because I cannot tell what it will amount to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose it will not be less than two or three volumes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible to have any idea of the cost, because we do not know how long the trial will last.

Mr. CONNESS. Under the addition offered to the rules to-day, I should think there would be an additional volume.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would be safe to estimate it at from five to ten thousand dollars. That, however, is a very general estimate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Although this is a small matter, I appeal to the Senate whether it is worth while to go into the free distribution of this book? Indeed, I hope that the whole system of distributing books among our constituents, at the expense of the great mass of the people for the benefit of a very few, will be discontinued. I will not myself vote for it. For the publication in the records of the country of these great proceedings in permanent and enduring form for the benefit not only of the present, but of future generations, I am perfectly willing to incur the necessary expense; but there is no department of this Government in which the abuses are more gross and scandalous than they are in printing for the Government of the United States. The printing in various forms for Congress, for the Congressional Globe, and for the Departments, now costs millions of dollars for each Congress, and the amount is accumulating more rapidly than a snow-ball in winter time. It seems to me that, although this item is a small one in itself, we had better stop now. If we distribute five thousand copies gratuitously among our constituents I think it is enough.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing what has become of the five thousand copies already ordered? We only receive one copy each.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are to be bound. Any Senator can take his copies as they go along, and have what he takes deducted from the final number given to him. But, Mr. President, I desire to say one word in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, and I wish the Senate to listen to me, for I have repeated what I am about to say a great many times here, and I never could make myself either understood or believed. The story that is in all the newspapers, and that the Senator from Ohio now, under a misapprehension, repeats, is entirely incorrect. The expenses of public printing, so far from being increased, have been greatly reduced since I have been familiar with them. I speak now of the printing of Congress. Of course our internal revenue system, as the Senator from Ohio knows very well, must make a large amount of printing, and that printing is all done here. It is done here, where it costs more than it would in some other places, because it is desirable that all the blanks and all the forms and all the returns should be printed from the same identical plates. It gives great security, great uniformity, and great accountability, and this is worth the additional expense. But the cost of printing for the two Houses of Congress is less to-day in dollars and cents in greenbacks than it was before the war in gold. The printing of the Departments we have no control over, but I have no reason to think it is at all extravagant. People have taken the cost of printing before the establishment of the Government Printing Office, and compared the cost of the printing for the two Houses prior to that time with the entire cost of the printing for the two Houses of Congress and all the Departments now, and, of course, the latter sum overtops the former.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, this resolution, so far as my State is concerned, will give me less than four copies for each congressional district. Now, sir, we are to take into account the fact that this publication will be largely in demand by members of the House of Representatives; and as a matter of course the Senators will be called upon by their colleagues in the other branch for a very large part of the distribution.

Again, sir, taking the question simply upon the ground that it is to be a distribution by the Senators themselves, as I said before, it would amount in the case of my State to less than four copies for each congressional district. Now, this is a very important and very interesting publication, and I would be in favor of curtailing the amount of publication upon other documents for which there is no large, no earnest demand among the people, and bestowing our attention to the publication of a larger number of this publication in preference to those others. As has already been stated, the amount of the additional cost incurred in this case is comparatively small; and if the Senate intend to distribute books at all, they ought to distribute this publication in preference to others. But, sir, it occurs to me that the distribution of the extra numbers proposed by the present resolution should be upon the same principle on which we distribute tickets. You have already provided for a distribution to Senators per capita, an equal number to each; and it seems to me that in providing for the publication of an additional number they should be distributed among the Senators in proportion to the population of their States, so that there will be a proportion, as far as the distribution by Senators is concerned, according to the number of congressional districts. I propose, therefore, to amend the resolution, so as to make this distribution conform to that rule or principle.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I believe this resolution would give to each Senator ninety additional copies; that would be equal in the State of Indiana to about eight or ten volumes to a congressional district. Now, it is simply absurd to say that that is furnishing general intelligence to the people. It would enable my colleague and myself to send over the State to an occasional person this volume to be put away for the dust to rest upon, perhaps, the balance of the party's life. My judgment is that the resolution offered by some Senator the other day, to allow the reporter of the Associated Press a seat upon the floor, which would cost the people not a cent, is worth more to the cause of general intelligence than this resolution, which will cost the Government perhaps ten or twenty thousand dollars. That is my conviction. If we want copies to supply the libraries the five thousand already furnished enable us to do that. If we want to send a copy to the county libraries we shall have to have more; and for the general libraries of the State and for the colleges this will furnish enough; but if you intend us to furnish it to the people as a body, so as to be a source of general intelligence, five thousand copies will be of very little consequence, will accomplish nothing, and I shall not vote for the resolution. I did not understand the facts to be as the Senator from Rhode Island has stated. My examination of this question at the last session satisfied me that there had been a great increase in the cost of congressional printing. I tried fairly to satisfy myself at the last session, and I thought there was a very great increase. It may not be so now; I do not know.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps, if the Senator has made an estimate, he can give us the figures. I should like to see them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was at the last session I examined.

Mr. ANTHONY. I refer to the last session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot give the figures I do not recollect figures for a year, and I should not want to have a mind that would; but my recollection is, that the increase had been nearly double.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, sir, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I may be mistaken; but I investigated with a desire to ascertain the facts. The argument here always is that each document which it is proposed to print in large numbers is the most important document that has come before the Senate. That argument is applied in every case. The number already provided for will enable us to supply the larger and more important libraries, colleges, and public institutions; beyond that I think the supply is not of general value to the people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] sent an amendment to the Chair which has not yet been read. It will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. BUCKALEW, which was to add to the resolution the following words:

And the distribution of the same to Senators shall be according to the population of the States respectively.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am against the amendment, and I am in favor of the original proposition. I would be willing myself to increase the additional number to ten thousand. I believe with the Senator from Indiana, that the amount of congressional printing is greatly too large. I have no doubt in my own opinion that with a proper respect to the public intelligence and service the aggregate amount of congressional printing might be reduced at least fivefold. There is a great multiplication of large and expensive documents in the printing, which are read by very few men; and I think that if the Committee on Public Printing of the Senate will turn their attention to economy and a restriction of printing in relation to useless documents from the Departments, reports of Secretaries, and restrict the number of those documents that are published, it would be a just and proper source of economy. But in relation to this trial there is probably no publication of the day that would be of more interest generally to the American people; not only all the State libraries, but all the county libraries, in my judgment, ought to have a full copy of the proceedings of this trial, and I think that the number ought to be multiplied to ten thousand instead of five thousand, in addition to the five thousand already ordered, that a proper and reasonable supply of this book may be made throughout the States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I regret to hear the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. It seems to me it is the first step taken to break down the equality of the States in this Union. It is a small step, I admit, but it looks that way. Printing is to be ordered by the Senate of the United States in which we stand here representing States without regard to their population. Now, as regards the question of distribution at any time of any document of this kind or any other kind, I should be very glad myself to part with a portion of my copies to any Senator from a larger State who desired to distribute it more than I supposed they were desired by my own constituents; but that is very different from introducing a principle that in a body composed of Senators representing States they are by their order to make a difference as regards the rights of Senators representing States in reference to the distribution of documents or any other act whatever.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I am also opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, for the same reason given by the Senator from Delaware; but I rose mainly to say that, in my judgment, the chairman of the Committee on Printing is entirely right in his statement in relation to the reduction of the actual expense of the printing for Congress. Some ten years ago, when I was a member of the other House, I was a member of the Committee on Printing, and had an opportunity then to know about the expense of congressional printing. About that time Congress was printing large numbers of documents, such as the reports on the Pacific railroad, making some thirteen large volumes, elaborately illustrated, and printed at great expense. About the same time they printed the report of Commodore Perry of the Japan expedition, which all Senators will recollect, at a cost of more than a million dollars. No such publications now are being made or printed at the expense of the Government. Large numbers of those publications were ordered and printed at that time. At the present time we have no such documents, but only the ordinary documents, and the same numbers of them that were then printed. I concur fully in the statement that the actual cost of printing for the two Houses of Congress is to-day much less than it was ten years ago. I have not examined the figures specially at present; but, judging from what I knew then about the matter, I have not the least doubt that the Senator from Rhode Island is entirely right.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I think my friend from Pennsylvania is the queerest sort of a State-rights man that I ever knew. I have no apprehension, however, that a proposition of this kind can pass this body. I agree with the Senator from Delaware, that although a very small step it is the first step toward destroying the equality of the States in this body. Perhaps the framers of the Constitution made a mistake in having the States represented here as equal States, rather than having them represented according to their population; but that is the theory we go upon, and I never will agree to anything which shall recognize any other theory in this body.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ANTHONY. In one moment I shall be through, and then I will answer the Senator's question.

I wish to say on another point, in regard to what fell from the Senator from Ohio, that although we have reduced the expenses of public printing very materially, I agree fully with what he says that the publication of documents for distribution is an abuse that ought to be not only diminished, but entirely abolished. I think that documents should be printed as they are in England, and I believe in France, at the public expense, in such quantities as the public demand is estimated for, and then sold at about two thirds the cost of publication, which will prevent them from being bought for waste paper and enable every man who really desires to have information with regard to the transactions of the Government to get them at a reasonable price.

Now, sir, I will hear the question which the Senator from New York wishes to propose to me.

Mr. CONKLING. I was going to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, sensitive as he is about State rights and constitutional rights, how he could have permitted such an infraction in this direction as took place when the tickets for admission to the galleries were distributed, as they are, in reference to the number of Representatives from the States?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because I could not prevent it. I thought it was a very small matter to make a fuss about, but I thought that was a very improper provision, and I think the Senate made a great mistake in doing it.

Mr. CONKLING. I call the attention of the Senator to it, because, seeing that we are verging upon another very dangerous precedent, I was afraid we should be drawn on further. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe the Senator from New York is responsible for that precedent. I think he introduced the resolution. The original resolution was introduced by me providing that the tickets should be distributed per capita. If it be desirable to distribute tickets, documents, or anything else other than per capita the distribution should be made through the House. I think it is very proper that the people of New York should have a larger number of tickets and a larger number of documents than the people of Delaware or Rhode Island; but I think that distribution should be made through the House of Representatives, where they are represented upon the popular basis, and not here, where they are represented upon the basis of States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is so there.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, it is so there.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that was a more flagrant case than this.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it was just such a case as this is. This is a small step; that was smaller still; but I think we ought to guard ourselves against any step in that direction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not apprehend that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania is about to pass, but I call his attention to the logic of the principle announced in this amendment. If that is right why does he not propose to have ten times the amount appropriated for newspapers and for stationery that Senators representing the smaller States receive? If it is right, why does he not occupy ten times the space, ten times the time, here that other Senators occupy, coming from smaller States? This is a question of the large fish swallowing the small ones, but I have read of some very voracious fish of extremely small dimensions who yet were able to swallow fish of a much larger size. When the Senator from Pennsylvania has succeeded in swallowing the Senator from Delaware, who sits nearer to him than I do, and is much larger than either of us, and digested him, I suppose he will reach out after me. I shall have the gratification, at least, of being swallowed last, and with less strain upon the Senator from Pennsylvania.

But, sir, if the logic enunciated here is to be carried out, why not carry it out in the other House of Congress also, when documents are distributed there? There are members of the House of Representatives who represent three and four times as much population as some other members. If we are to look into this matter why not see by what majorities Senators have been sent here?

With regard to the former expenses of printing, when we were in the habit of publishing Pacific railroad reports, I believe it is true that the expenses of printing were very much larger than they are now; but we have got rid of those large and magnificently illustrated volumes, and now are confined to much smaller ones, and I hope soon may be to a much smaller number. In my judgment we ought to follow the course indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island, and distribute nothing gratuitously, but publish all our documents at the lowest possible expense and allow them to be sold by the Government at cost. I shall vote against the amendment and against the original proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, nothing is more true historically than that the Constitution of the United States could not have been adopted, and no Union could have been formed without the admission of the equality of the States in this Chamber. I mean, nothing is more true than that at that time those things could not have been accomplished except upon that assumption; and I believe, looking at the history of the Government from the period of its organization to the present hour, that it is owing, to the equality of the States in this Chamber that the Union has been preserved. I do not think that it could have been preserved if the Government had been exclusively in the hands of a mere numerical majority. Periods have occurred in our history which, I think, if properly studied, will demonstrate the truth of what I state. Believing that such has been the result in the past, I believe it will continue to be the result in the future. A popular Government like ours, extending over a territory as extensive as ours, cannot be maintained by a mere numerical vote. Practically, it would become the government of the masses, the government in one sense of the mob, without the restraint which our being divided into communities, small and large, in this Chamber is sure to impose. We, by our conduct—I mean the Senate, not the individual members who now compose this body, or who at any time in the past have composed it, or in the future will compose it—because of the smallness of our number, and because of the interest we feel in the preservation of our State governments, operate to check what might be hazardous and mischievous legislation. I am, therefore, unwilling that, as far as the Senate is concerned, it should in any instance, if it can be avoided, sanction a principle which recognizes the inequality of the States in this Chamber. I am aware that that inequality exists in the case of the distribution of tickets; but it passed sub silentio. The attention of the Senate was not called to the fact. It certainly escaped mine. But now the honorable member from Pennsylvania proposes a measure which can only be maintained upon the ground that there is an inequality, and that that inequality should be recognized as existing. Against that I protest as at war with the very principle upon which the Government was founded, and dangerous to the continuing and wholesome preservation of the Union.

Mr. CONNESS. I cannot have anything to say on this subject from the constitutional point of view; but I will take this opportunity to say that I wish some of our good legislators would report a provision to govern the distribution of documents, making it the duty of Senators and Representatives to distribute them among the libraries in their States, and, if necessary, for the reporting of those libraries here, and the appointment of a secretary or clerk to make the distribution. Then it could not be claimed that they were given to personal favorites, nor that they would not go into the most general use. When I came here first I caused a list of the libraries of my State to be made, and it has gone on until I am distributing the documents that I receive to a list of fifty-six libraries. At least twenty of those have been induced to be formed since, because they knew they would get documents in that way. I know it has caused me some little personal difficulty because personal friends and even newspapers have complained that I did not furnish them with valuable documents such as they received sometimes from other parties; but it occurred to me that the books were not mine to give to anybody as a gift, but that they were published for public use, and that the best custodians of them were those conducting and carrying on and maintaining libraries to which the public had free access. If a provision of that kind could be made, and I think it could, I do not know any small reform that would result in a greater percentage of good.

Before I sit down I will say that I am in favor of printing this additional number of copies asked for. No question is involved but the one of whether we shall authorize the publication of five thousand or ten thousand copies. I am in favor of ten thousand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend whether he has any good evidence that other Senators are not as careful about the libraries in their States as he is of those in his State?

Mr. CONNESS. I have not. If it be a fact that others have done as I have done, or if I have copied from others, in either case it is, in my opinion, the best distribution; but I incline to think it is not a universal mode. Now, I ask the Senator whether he thinks it is?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not any opinion about others. I know I am very careful to send documents to all the libraries that I know anything about in my own State, and my colleagues do the same, and I have no doubt every library in the State is supplied with public documents.

Mr. YATES. I do not know, sir, that I would have any objection to the principle proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, because Illinois is already the fourth State in the Union in population, and I think my share would far exceed that of the Senator from Rhode Island, or the Senator from Vermont, or the Senator from Massachusetts. Moreover, I think that in a very few years Illinois will be the second State of the Union in population, and then the distribution to which her Senators would be entitled upon this principle would be a very large one indeed. But, sir, I do not think this is the point or the place to discuss this great constitutional question of State rights and State equality. I think we can find other times and other subjects upon which to discuss that great question. I believe that the States are equal. I wish I could say that we had equality in the standard of citizenship as we have constitutional equality of the States in the Senate.

But, sir, I rose for the purpose of saying that if we go further than to ask for the publication of enough of these books to furnish the libraries I shall oppose it, because there will be a scramble from all of our constituents for these books which we shall be unable to supply.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am in favor of cultivating the spirit of economy here. I believe great abuses have prevailed on the subject of printing and distributing documents; but, sir, the record of this trial is unlike anything else we have had in the history of this country. There is a deep and abiding interest on the subject felt by the people. Perhaps there has been no document printed, and there will be none printed for years, that will excite so much interest as the history of this trial, no document which the people will be so glad to get as a correct record or history of this trial. I have already had applications for it; and I presume every Senator here has had. I think the people will not expect a rigid reform in the way of printing to commence on this subject and at this time. They will expect that we shall be enabled to inform some of them at least correctly in regard to the history of this trial. The Congressional Globe is seen by but few persons. There are but few newspapers that print the full history of the trial. It may be done in New York, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, and Boston; but as a general thing the newspapers give but a meager account of the trial; no full account that would be satisfactory.

Now, sir, on the subject of the distribution of this document, it is said by some that the distribution should be made to the States equally. Why? Because the States are entitled to equal representation in this body. I insist that an equal distribution of these documents would not be just. Take the State of Delaware, with her small population; would it be fair to give to the people of Delaware the same number of documents that you would give to the people of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, or Indiana? Is there any justice in that? It does not affect the question of State equality at all. It is only the question of the equality of population, not the question of the equal rights of the States. We do recognize that the population of the States is unequal. We recognize it in a hundred ways. Our legislation provides for it in a hundred ways, recognizes the fact that New York has many times the population of Rhode Island and of Delaware. We are bound to recognize it in a thousand ways. We do not affect the principle of the equal representation of the States in this body by saying that documents printed at the public expense shall be distributed according to population.

The doctrine of the equal representation of the States in the Senate is not to be affected or to be overthrown by the fact that you distribute documents according to population. These documents do not go to the States, but they go to the people; and therefore it is right to send them to the States according to the number of their people. There should be nothing done to make the doctrine of equal representation of the States in this body more unpopular than it is now. There is in this country a strong feeling, and it has developed itself more within the last two years than, perhaps, at any former period, against the justice and propriety of allowing Delaware, with a population of one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand, to have the same power in this body that the State of New York has with her four million population. I do not sympathize with that feeling; but I say it exists, and it is becoming stronger from year to year. This distribution of documents or the distribution of tickets according to the number of Representatives in the other House or according to population does not affect the other question at all. It only recognizes the inequality of population which we recognize in a thousand forms and legislate for accordingly. These documents are not for the States, but they are for the people of the States, and therefore they ought to be sent to the States according to the number of their people.

Mr. YATES. The principle that is contended for by the honorable Senator from Indiana, if carried out, would amount to this: that Indiana should have Senators in proportion to her population; Illinois should have Senators in proportion to her population; and every other State should have Senators in proportion to her population. That is the principle for which he contends. We cannot think of introducing this distinction between the States in the Senate of the United States. In the House the distinction is made. There each Representative receives his documents in proportion to population; but in the Senate we can only act upon the spirit of equality. It would be ungenerous in the highest degree for States of a large population to encroach upon the rights of the smaller States and destroy the constitutional equality which was provided for by the framers of the Government.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I had no expectation of raising a grave constitutional question or debate by proposing my amendment to this resolution. I suppose that the equal representation of the States in the Senate is a question of power. They have equal power here. What is before us is a question with reference to the exercise of power. Although the Senators from the State of Delaware and from the State of New York have equal power over all questions pertaining to legislation, they are bound to exercise their powers in a reasonable and proper manner. Now, sir, in the present case, when it comes to the distribution of an extra number of public documents, it will be but a reasonable exercise of that unquestioned equality of State power that they should be distributed according to the demand and according to the numbers of the people in the respective sections of the country. Gentlemen confound two things which are quite distinct and independent of each other.

Mr. Madison thought that our system of government was a compound one, that it was made up of two principles; that in some respects it was federal and in some respects it was national. With regard to the location of power in the Senate of the United States it may be considered from the former point of view, as exclusively and entirely federal, in which State equality is maintained entire and intact; but in the exercises of our power we act for a great nation, and we must act upon principles of equality and even-handed justice to the people in all portions of the country.

I think, therefore, that the criticisms to which my amendment has been subjected are quite inapplicable, are strange, are unjust, and deserve no further answer than a mere statement of the most apparent and palpable distinctions which exist in the very nature of things in the constitution of our Government.

This argument is equally absurd with another argument which may be made: that because the States are equal in power here they are to be equally taxed. If gentlemen will run out their principle there will be no end to the absurdities. I suppose the State of Delaware would object very much if, upon this grand doctrine of State equality, we should ask her to pay into the public Treasury an equal amount with the State of New York. And so with regard to appropriations of the public money to the various objects of disbursement in the country. What could be more absurd than to insist that our appropriations of money should be upon this principle of territorial equality or of State equality, instead of being according to the common necessities and the general interests of the people of the country?

Now, sir, be it observed that the Senate has already made provision for the distribution of these documents among Senators upon a principle of perfect equality, upon a per capita rule. We have already made provision for that. The individual demands of each Senator for his own convenience and for the convenience of his State interests are already provided for. Now, what is proposed? That we shall print an extra number of documents. With reference to what? An equal demand among members of the Senate? No, sir; but a general and common demand in the country, which is a demand in proportion to population. The means which we propose to supply among the people are to be measured by the numbers in the respective sections.

I insist, therefore, that in printing these extra copies of this work, after the ordinary usage of an equal distribution among the members has been complied with and fulfilled, we shall provide for a just and fair distribution of them among the people. That is all to which my amendment points; and although I am not very particular with reference to this question I think that it stands upon good ground, and that it ought to command the assent of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall have a vote on this resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I will wait a little while.

Mr. ANTHONY. I may be allowed to explain that it is of a great deal of importance, if this printing is to be ordered at all, that it should be ordered now; because, if done now, it saves the resetting of the type. I have no sort of preference whether the Senate votes it up or votes it down; but I wish to have it disposed of now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORGAN. I think there are some other persons intending to speak on this subject—

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall vote down the motion.

Mr. MORTON. I want to say one word in reply to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order on a motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state that if there are no persons wishing to speak on the subject before the Senate I will withdraw the motion to allow a vote to be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] to the resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. MORTON. If I understood the Senator from Illinois correctly, he said that the principle that I advocated would give the number of Senators to the various States according to their population. The Senator is mistaken. I did not say any such thing, or anything like it. My friend misunderstood me. I said I did not sympathize with that feeling which was growing up in the country against the equal representation of the States in the Senate; but I said that such a feeling did exist, and was becoming stronger. I said that this had nothing to do with the question of the right of equal representation; but simply recognized the inequality of population, and that there was no justice in sending as many documents to one hundred thousand people in Delaware as you would to four million people in New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on adopting the resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The resolution was adopted—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say one word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order on this motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not going to debate it; but there is on the table an appropriation bill that I have been waiting for an opportunity to call to the attention of the Senate. It ought to be passed. It is to provide for the necessary expenses of the proceedings now before the Senate. I wish to say to my honorable friend who makes this motion that I do not desire to oppose it, but I wish to suggest to him the importance of passing this bill, and I doubt whether it will take us ten minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be in favor of taking up that bill immediately after the executive session.

Mr. CONNESS. We shall not come out into open session to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senate to consider whether they will take up the bill at the present time or after the executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator from New York to withdraw his motion while I offer a resolution calling for information. We are not having legislative sessions, and I cannot do it at any other time. I shall vote with the Senator for his motion.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can offer his resolution while the doors are being closed.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be received.

FISHERIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of any papers in the Department of State relating to any application by any party for exclusive privileges in connection with the fisheries in our recent purchase of territory from Russia; and whether any steps have been taken, or acts done, tending to the extension of such exclusive privilege or sale of lands in the said Territory to private parties or companies.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. COLE. I suggest to my colleague that that resolution includes fisheries only.

Mr. CONNESS. It also relates to lands.

Mr. COLE. I ask my colleague to amend it by including "hunting and trading" as well.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. COLE. I ask my colleague to allow the resolution to be amended by inserting the words "hunting, trading, and" before the words "the fisheries;" so as to read, "exclusive privileges in connection with hunting, trading, and the fisheries in our recent purchase."

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to that. I accept it. I will state to the Senate in brief, without reading it, that I hold in my hand quite an extensive dispatch, which has cost twenty-three dollars in gold to send here, touching a good deal of public feeling which exists at San Francisco on this subject, and I desire to obtain the information from the proper source.

The resolution was adopted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and, after two hours and a half spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 14, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Messrs. HALSEY and HILL, of New Jersey; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin.

PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

WASHINGTON AND NEW YORK RAILROAD.

Mr. TABER, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Messrs. Henry Clews & Co., Rufus Hatch & Co., and a large number of merchants and capitalists of New York city, praying for the passage of the bill now before Congress for a national railroad between Washington and New York; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

REPORT OF HON. FREEMAN H. MORSE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the House the report of Hon. Freeman H. Morse, United States consul at London, on the mercantile marine and commercial policy of Great Britain, recently made to the State Department, and also a copy of the dispatch of Mr. Morse, No. 325, dated May 12, 1866.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that on the return of the House from the Senate to-day he will present certain executive communications; and he also now renews the notice given yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] that on Thursday next, after the House returns to this Hall, and after the disposition of the pending resolution relative to the printing of the opening speech of Manager BUTLER in the impeachment trial, he will call up for action House bill relating to the rights of naturalized citizens abroad.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. There will be business to be transacted upon the return of the House to this Hall.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF GENEVA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
April 14, 1868.

SIR: I take the liberty of inclosing to you, with the request that you will submit it to the House, a copy of an "address of members of the Chamber of Commerce of Geneva and a number of citizens to the Congress of the United States of America and the chambers of commerce of their sister Republic."

I am advised that some of the gentlemen who signed the address are members of the Government of the Canton of Geneva, and of the Federal Congress of Switzerland, and that all are persons of the highest respectability.

The Government and the people of Switzerland sympathized sincerely with the Government and loyal people of the United States in their recent struggle for the preservation of the Union and of constitutional liberty, and they are therefore, perhaps, justifiable in expressing to Congress through one of their most important chambers of commerce the interest which they feel in the advancement and maintenance of our financial credit.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,
H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the letter and accompanying address were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SEPARATE CUSTOMS DISTRICT, MAINE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of a special agent of the Department, relative to the necessity of a separate customs district in Maine, and recommending the same; which, on motion of Mr. PETERS, were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMSHIP ATLANTIC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House, the correspondence between that Department and the district attorney of New York, relative to the steamship Atlantic; which, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for the relief of a soldier.

The SPEAKER. No business can be now transacted unless proper notification was given before the House went to the Senate.

And then, on motion of Mr. COVODE, (at twelve o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of citizens of Washington and District of Columbia, praying for the passage of House bill No. 224, for the incorporation of the Washington and Cincinnati National Railroad Company.

By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: Additional vouchers in support of the claimants for losses sustained by the capture of the United States war steamer Undine.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of Thomas S.

Hathaway, Pardon Tillinghast, and 57 others, merchants of New Bedford, Massachusetts, praying that the effective action of the Coast Survey may be continued.

Also, the petition of T. W. Sherman and others, praying that the service ratings may not be withdrawn from retired officers.

By Mr. PAINE: A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, for an appropriation for the Buffalo harbor.

Also, the petition of R. C. Hathaway, of Wisconsin, for a survey and sale of certain lands in that State.

By Mr. TROWBRIDGE: A memorial of the trustees of the Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Agriculture, asking Congress to engage the services of Professor John Gamgee, head of the Albert Veterinary College, London, to investigate the diseases of the live stock of this country with a view to their prevention and cure, and thus saving to the country the thousands of dollars now annually lost in consequence of the ignorance on the subject.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 15, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair, that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock p. m.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 462.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that is done, I suggest to the Senator from Maine whether we should not pass the order which was asked for on the impeachment trial?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator has one prepared I will give way; but I hope this bill will be allowed to come up first.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand the order will be presented in a moment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the bill first come up and then it can be laid aside for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the matter before the Senate be informally passed over for the moment that I may offer the order which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order may be received by unanimous consent without displacing the bill before the Senate.

There being no objection, the following order, submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, was considered and agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to furnish to the counsel for the President a statement of the beginning and end of each executive and legislative session from 1789 to 1868.

SENATE CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line nine, before the word "expenses," to strike out the words "miscellaneous items, including the;" and in line eleven to strike out "fifty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line eleven:

For miscellaneous items, $50,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is rather liberal legislation on "miscellaneous" propositions. I think we ought to know something about it. We vote miscellaneous sometimes, but not such large sums if it can be avoided. I think the chairman of the committee ought to state to the Senate something about what it relates to, why it is, and how this deficiency has occurred.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Out of this "miscellaneous" item are paid a great variety of expenses, such as ordinary labor about the Capitol not specifically provided for, which is oftentimes considerable. Then there are funeral expenses, which are sometimes large. Then, growing out of an irregularity of practice, this fund is sometimes drawn upon where other appropriations have been short. Upon the best examination we could give it the Committee on Appropriations became thoroughly satisfied that there is a deficiency growing out of these reasons to this extent, which the Senate ought to provide for. That is the general statement. This business belongs more immediately, however, to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask the Senator whether any part of this appropriation for miscellaneous items refers to the expenses of this trial?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; that is specifically provided for.

Mr. DIXON. That is covered by the specific appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Ten thousand dollars are, as far as the committee have any information, deemed sufficient for any expenses of this trial.

Mr. DIXON. The "miscellaneous" appropriation does not refer to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No. That item relates to what is found necessary to carry us forward to the end of the current year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should not have asked the question which I propounded to the chairman if the Secretary of the Senate had furnished us any statement of the origin of this deficiency or the causes of it which would have enlightened us upon the subject. Now, sir, upon the general statement made by the chairman I am not prepared to vote this sum of $50,000 for miscellaneous items, to be under the control of the Secretary of the Senate. I think it is without parallel that, without a report from the Secretary of the Senate showing what these expenses are and how it is that the Senate ought to appropriate $50,000, we should vote upon a general averment of miscellaneous expenditures so much money. There is not much use in talking about economy, retrenchment, and reform if we legislate in this general way without that information which will enable us to judge whether this money has been properly used by a public officer, and whether we ought to vote it as a deficiency. I understand this is a "deficiency."

Now, what has there been in the history of the Senate so peculiar and extraordinary that this deficiency should have occurred? I believe the chairman mentions funeral expenses. I am not prepared to say whether those expenses have necessarily been larger recently than heretofore. They are expenses that no Senator will question; they are not to be questioned; but they will hardly account for a fifth part of this $50,000 for miscellaneous expenditures. The answer given by the chairman is to my mind not satisfactory.

Mr. CRAGIN. I rise to make a little statement in relation to this matter. The Senator from Indiana says that he is unwilling that this large amount should be under the control of the Secretary of the Senate. I can inform him that it is not under the control of the Secretary in any shape or manner whatever. There are some matters of interest in this bill in regard to which, if Senators will give me their attention, we may come to an understanding. Being on the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and chairman of the committee, my attention has been especially called and directed to the subjects-matter of this bill, and especially to these items of miscellaneous expenses. Every Senator will at once see that this is a very general term. It includes a multitude of items. Among them, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, are items of funeral expenses. Perhaps there has been no call during this session for any expenditure on this account; but Senators will remember that Senator Riddle died in April last, and, although there was no funeral here, there were expenses attending his burial. Then the expenses of investigating committees are paid out of it. There was the investigation by the Judiciary Committee in the case of Mr. Thomas, Senator-elect from Maryland. All the expenses of witnesses, and the other expenses of investigating committees come out of this item. Then there are the expenses for carpenters' work and repairs to this end of the building, painting, &c., which generally take place in the vacation. The carpenters' work, I may say, is considerable every month. There are boxes and various things; the mending of furniture, &c. Then some of the messengers and clerks in the Secretary's office are paid out of this fund. Then we have various miscellaneous items, such as we have all seen mentioned in the newspapers, such as soap, brushes, towels, &c. They are all paid for out of this fund. The towels and soap are used in the committee-rooms and in the cloak-rooms. Then there are brooms, tubs, pails, and an infinite variety of articles used around the Senate Chamber, that are bought and paid for out of this appropriation. There are also some things furnished in the committee-rooms, as books, which come out of this item. Frequently, as at present, this appropriation is needed to pay for furniture and repairs; for instance, the fitting up of the Committee-room on Appropriations was an extra expense during this fiscal year; or at least it must be paid for out of this item. Then there are the carpets for the reception-room, the carpets in this Hall, in the marble-room, and in several of the committee-rooms, which have been put down during the year, to be paid for out of this fund. The item for furniture and repairs appropriated at the last session of Congress was not sufficient, and these bills must be paid out of this item.

During the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1867, there was appropriated, in the first place, $30,000 for this item, and then a deficiency afterward of $30,000 more, making $60,000. There has been appropriated already for this fiscal year $30,000 for this item; and when we take into consideration that we had a session in July and another in November, and that this is now the long session, I think Senators will readily see why we need $20,000 more for this fiscal year than was used during the last fiscal year. I know from an examination of the books and of the items of expense that have been paid and are to be paid that this amount is necessary to carry us through this present fiscal year up to the 30th of June next.

Mr. DIXON. It appears from the statement of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses that this is really an addition to the appropriation for contingent expenses. It is an increase of so much, $50,000, to the fund for contingent expenses of this body, as I understand.

Mr. CRAGIN. One item of the contingent expenses.

Mr. DIXON. Everything the Senator has stated which is to come out of this appropriation has always been paid for from the contingent fund of the Senate. I also had the honor of being chairman of that committee for several years, and I know we never, under any circumstances, had an appropriation in the whole of $50,000 a year. There were some cases in which it was necessary to make an appropriation for deficiencies in the contingent expenses of the Senate, but never amounting, according to my recollection, to one fifth of this appropriation. Now, I do not say that this is not necessary. I do not say that the Senate ought not to adopt the amendment; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the contingent expenses of the Senate are being increased by the addition of the amount of $50,000. It may be all right, but we ought to adopt it with our eyes open.

Mr. CRAGIN. I stated that a year ago a deficiency of $30,000 was voted for this very item. Last winter, just after the short session, $30,000 was appropriated as a deficiency, $30,000 having been originally appropriated, making $60,000 for the last fiscal year, in which was included the short session of Congress. Now we ask for $50,000 deficiency, whereas there was $30,000 last year, in order that we may pay the expenses for this long session and the two intermediate sessions in July and November. The expenses were greatly increased, as Senators must see, from the fact of the additional session of this Congress during the last summer.

Mr. DIXON. I think the honorable Senator is mistaken in regard to the increase of expense. The regular appropriations for contingent expenses were made, and a deficiency was occasioned by the expense of furnishing the new rooms. Large expense was incurred in furnishing the committee-rooms, and there was also a large item for ornamental painting of the committee-rooms which I objected to at the time, not thinking it ought to be charged to the contingent fund; but it was. As I have stated, I do not say that this is not proper; but one thing I do say, it is not proper that it should be adopted in this form; it ought to be stated to be an addition to the contingent expenses of the Senate; so much for a deficiency for contingent expenses. Heretofore that has always been the case. It has never been brought in under the form of miscellaneous expenses in this way. It does not appear what it is for. But for the statement of the honorable chairman it would scarcely have been known that this was an addition to the contingent fund of the Senate. I shall offer no amendment, but it is for the honorable chairman of the committee to make such a suggestion as he may think proper by way of amendment. I state merely for the information of the Senate that this is really an addition to the contingent expenses, and it seems to me it ought to be so stated in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask a question of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. It is this: whether the expenses of many sessions of a Congress are not more than the expenses of a few sessions?

Mr. CRAGIN. Of course they are.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator if he cannot manage to have fewer sessions of Congress, so that we can reduce the miscellaneous expenses?

Mr. CRAGIN. I have no objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The amount of this appropriation in the bill originally as sent to the Committee on Appropriations was $40,000. They have divided it into two items now. It originally stood "for the expenses of the trial of the President and other miscellaneous expenses, $50,000." They report to us now an appropriation of $10,000 for the trial and $50,000 for other miscellaneous objects. I have not heard the reason given for this increase, and until better advised I am not prepared to agree to it. I wish to move to make the amount what it was before and I propose to reduce this item to $40,000, unless some reason be given for changing it. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking off "fifty" and inserting "forty."

Mr. HENDRICKS. The explanation made by the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses will hardly do for a full understanding of this subject. The expenses of the funeral of our deceased friend from Delaware could not have been very large, not nearly as large as the expenses attending most funerals.

Mr. CRAGIN. More than one fiftieth part of this appropriation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I said that in my opinion the funeral expenses could not amount to one fifth of this $50,000, which would be $10,000; and now, inasmuch as the Senator has been able to refer to but one case, I do not suppose those expenses exceeded $500.

Mr. CRAGIN. More than that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At any rate we have no evidence on the subject. The Secretary of the Senate has furnished us with no report, and I ask the Senator whether that officer has made a detailed statement of these items to the committee?

Mr. CRAGIN. I will state that there is a large number of unpaid bills. The Secretary of the Senate has not paid the bills, and they now remain unpaid, there being no money to pay them. The fitting up of the Senate Chamber last fall was an occurrence that does not happen more than once in three or four years. Then there was the fitting up of the room of the Committee on Appropriations. The Naval Committee room was completed, and so was the Military Committee room, the Library, the reception-room, the marble-room, and the corridors. All these expenses were incurred last fall. Bills to a small extent have been paid, but quite large amounts remain unpaid. That is one item, and, perhaps, the principal item in this account of miscellaneous items.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going to speak of that. The Senator spoke of painting and carpenter work. I suppose that is in this building. I have not seen where it is going on, and I do not know anything about it; but I will call the Senator's attention to the twenty-third line of the bill, where there is an appropriation of $5,000 for "deficiency in the appropriation for furniture and repairs," covering this very subject he spoke of.

Mr. DIXON. Is there not also an appropriation for stationery?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; that is stricken out, apparently. Then the deficiency in regard to furniture and repairs being provided for, we have an appropriation of $50,000 for miscellaneous items, and the only suggestion of anything to come out of this fund is the expense attending the burial of one Senator.

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGIN. Some two or three weeks ago a resolution passed the Senate to pay the representatives of the late Noah Smith, principal legislative clerk of the Senate, $300 for funeral expenses and three months' pay, to come out of the contingent fund of the Senate. There is a bill that will amount to about one thousand dollars that must come out of this item, if we make the appropriation; for if we do not make it it cannot be paid. If the Senator, at any time within a week, will take the trouble to walk with me for three or four hours about this Capitol and about the different rooms down below and up above, I will show him better than I can tell him now where this money goes. It is in small items frequently. The Senator from Kentucky asked me if many sessions of Congress are not more expensive than few. During the July session the miscellaneous expenses were considerable. Among other things, large quantities of ice were used in hydrating and cooling the Chamber, besides a little iced lemonade; and I may say to the Senate, as all know, that there was nothing stronger. If gentlemen will go about this end of the Capitol they will find much property of various kinds belonging to the United States that is paid for out of this item. For instance, painting to the amount of $2,000 was done during the vacation last fall; below here mainly, but partly in this Chamber, touching up the gilding where it had been rubbed off by chairs leaning back, and so on. Most of the matters under this item are not under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, for he has nothing whatever to do with them.

Mr. DIXON. Under whom do they come?

Mr. CRAGIN. Most of the expenditures under this item are under the direction of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, Mr. President, I will go on with what I was about to say.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from

Indiana will allow me, I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. I wish to know whether the expenses before the committees for reporting, for witnesses, &c., do not come out of this fund?

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly, they do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We had one of the reporters of the Senate before the Judiciary Committee at one time taking testimony in a case involving a right to a seat, I think Mr. Thomas's case; and I certified to the bill, but the reporter told me he had not been able to get his pay.

Mr. CRAGIN. There was no money to pay it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. How much was it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That bill was not much—less than one hundred dollars, I think. The Senator from Indiana remembers that case where we had one of the reporters taking testimony and a number of witnesses before us, some from Maryland and some from New York. I do not remember what the precise amount was; but I recollect that when the bills were brought to me I certified them as chairman of the committee, and I learned afterward that there was no fund out of which the reporter could be paid. I suppose it is included in some of these appropriations.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from New Hampshire suggested that I should take a walk some pleasant day to different parts of the Capitol. I know I should enjoy it very much, and I am sure he could explain matters with entire satisfaction, inasmuch as the rules have abolished liquor from the institution. [Laughter.] I could take a very pleasant walk and examine the rooms; but inasmuch as I am not a good judge of carpenters' work and painting, I would rather the Secretary of the Senate had informed us exactly how much money he had and what exactly he had done with it, and why it is that $50,000 more is necessary. That would be more satisfactory, and I should know a great deal better just what money was spent, what it was spent upon, if we had an exact statement, and we could then know why this deficiency is to be provided for and where it is to go.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I should be very glad to have an opportunity of saying a few words about these expenses. The country is full of the impression that there is a defalcation somewhere in the accounts of the Senate; and there is a question of veracity, I am told, between the Secretary of the Senate and his confidential clerk, amounting to some forty or fifty thousand dollars. I think this is a question about which we ought to have some time to reflect. For myself particularly I should like to know exactly how all the money of this Senate is expended. I think the most important situation belonging to the Senate is the chairmanship of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I have great confidence in my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN.] I have no doubt he will do what is right in the matter; but, having been a man of business, and having dealt in figures during a long life, I should like to know what money has been expended, and how it has been expended.

I should like to see every dollar and every cent put down with a receipt or a voucher for everything that has been done. I have heard that there are some difficulties, some differences of opinion between the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Secretary of the Senate. I do not want to get into the difficulty between them, but I want to know how each of those officers has performed his duty; and especially do I want to know why a confidential clerk and relative of the Secretary of the Senate has been dismissed, he complaining that injustice has been done him, as I understand, and that the money was properly expended by him; but yet there is a balance against the funds. I want to know where the wrong is. I have no charge to make against anybody. The general impression of my mind always is that everybody is honest, but here we are the mere agents of others. I think that a great difficulty in this Government is the contingent expenses of Congress; and we here in the Senate, above all others, should see to it that our accounts are properly squared. There is no system in the world so correct as that of book-keeping by double entry, and by it an intelligent man can see at once whether a rogue or an honest man has been expending money. I should like to see this account balanced for the last eight or ten years. I will give way to my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. CRAGIN. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested one or two inquiries, from which, unless some reply is made, an impression might go out here that would be injurious. Now, I wish to say, in the outset, that the Secretary of the Senate has no power to contract debts for the Senate, so far as I have been able to ascertain from any law. The Secretary of the Senate gives bonds as the disbursing agent of the Senate, and pays out the money on presentation of bills properly certified by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, or under laws making appropriations. For instance, there are certain bills that are paid without coming before the Committee on Contingent Expenses at all. The law provides for paying the salaries of our officers, clerks, and others about the Senate, and of course their monthly bills are made out and paid without a reference to the committee; but the Secretary of the Senate, as I said before, so far as I know, has no power to run the Senate in debt or to defraud it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask him whether there is not something wrong in regard to the funds of the Senate to the extent of about forty thousand dollars, and whether the old gentleman who was the pay clerk of the Senate, Mr. Wagner, was not dismissed last fall, and whether the Senator has made any inquiry into that business?

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I will state the facts of the case. It was ascertained some time during the last fall that the money supposed to be in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate, or subject to his order, was somewhere deficient.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I wish to ask the Senator a question right there.

Several SENATORS. Let him finish his statement.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. Wagner was called upon to account for that deficiency, and in the examination—he never said it to me, but I have full faith to believe it—he acknowledged to Colonel Forney and others that he—I do not know that I ought to state it.

Mr. WILSON and others. Say it now.

Mr. CRAGIN. That he had taken money from the safe or drawn it from the Treasury to the amount of $40,000, and appropriated it and used it as his own.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment at that point?

Several SENATORS. No, no; let him go on and finish the statement.

Mr. CRAGIN. I will finish my statement first. Mr. Wagner acknowledged this defalcation on his part, and at once turned over all the property he held, as I understand, to Colonel Forney to secure him. Colonel Forney raised the money to the amount that Mr. Wagner stated he had taken from him, and went up to the Treasury Department and there deposited it, so that the Government should not be the loser of one dollar on his account. These are the facts, as I understand them, in relation to that matter.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he saw that money; whether he had any evidence of the deposit by Colonel Forney of $40,000 to make up that deficiency?

Mr. CRAGIN. I have seen a certificate from the Comptroller, Mr. Taylor, I think, certifying to that fact. As to the exact amount I do not remember.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, I desire to state that this Mr. Wagner is a relation of Mr. Forney, the Secretary of the Senate. He held the very responsible situation of cashier of the York bank, one of the best conducted banks in Pennsylvania, and was there for more than thirty years, living a life of frugality, and saving out of his salary a small sum. He was invited to come here, and with his knowledge of accounts and his high character, to take charge of the accounts of the Secretary of the Senate. He came here, as I understand, living frugally, spending no money, having no bad habits, and buying nothing but a house, for which I think he paid some six or seven thousand dollars. He has a family who do their own labor, keeping no servants, as the German people of Pennsylvania are in the habit of living. He was devoting his whole time to this place. He leaves here suddenly with a deficiency in his accounts, as it is stated, of $40,000. Since he has left, I am told, he says it is not true; that there is no deficiency chargeable to him. Now, as a citizen of my State, a good old man, as everybody in Pennsylvania who knows him—and there are many who do know him—says he is, I am not willing that he shall be disgraced, and that his children and grandchildren shall be disgraced without a proper examination. I want no appropriation made here until the Senate see the whole of these accounts. Let us see how these accounts have been kept in the last six years; who has spent the money; who has drawn money improperly; and who has used money which he had no right to use. It may be that this gentleman is not guilty. It is possible, and barely possible, that he cannot be guilty of an offense so heinous as this would be of using money intrusted to his charge.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, will my friend allow me to explain this bill, and see whether we cannot obviate the difficulty and make this appropriation and attend afterward to the question which impresses itself upon his mind?

Mr. CAMERON. I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In the first place, I want to say that whatever has transpired in the way supposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania has no possible connection with this bill, not the slightest in the world. There have been irregularities in the keeping of the accounts; I have seen them myself; but I am not aware that the interests of the Senate of the United States are at all involved in it. It is a matter between the Secretary of the Senate and his confidential clerk; and if the Senate feel an interest to investigate that matter they can instruct the Committee on Contingent Expenses to do so.

This bill came from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, with its passage recommended by that committee. It was then referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Finding it my duty to examine it, I took the bill and went to the cashier to examine the heads appropriated for here to ascertain the general fact whether a deficiency to these several amounts existed. That was my first inquiry. Now, I will take them up in detail and explain them, and see whether the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] will not agree that this is not the time to examine that subject, or, in other words, that this bill need not be postponed until that subject is examined.

The first item in this bill is an appropriation for the expenses of the impeachment trial. None of us, I take it, think we can afford to postpone that. Witnesses have been called from a distance. Not a dollar has been paid to any witness. Some of them have gone away leaving their pay behind. It is hardly creditable, I think, to the Senate of the United States that that state of things should exist.

Mr. CRAGIN. If the Senator from Maine will allow me I will correct him in that particular. At the time this bill was introduced there was no money to pay witnesses, but the question arose whether these witnesses should be allowed to go away without their pay, those who were not going to return, and I suggested to the Secretary that he should in some way procure the money to pay them as the bills were presented, and I think he has done so in some cases.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am sorry that the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Secretary of the Senate or anybody else should feel at liberty to go on the streets and borrow money in the name of the Senate of the United States. I do not believe we ought to be put in the attitude of doing any such thing. If there is a trial here on foot, the Senate, I insist upon it, should provide the expenses. What these expenses will be cannot be known, but the committee, on the best information we had, calling before us the officers connected with it, concluded that $10,000 would perhaps cover the expenses of this trial.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not desire the Senator to represent me, if it can be done by inference from his remarks, as opposing the appropriation of $10,000 for the expenses of the trial. My opinion is we shall have to appropriate much more than that. Whatever the expenses of the trial are must be paid, and paid cheerfully.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I had not the slightest reference to the honorable Senator; I had not him in my mind; I did not understand him to rise for that inquiry. Now, let us take the next appropriation:

For miscellaneous items, $50,000.

I tried to see, in a general way, how that arose. There is a deficiency—there is no mistake about that—on the books. I have seen it and seen the items.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to put a question to him in regard to that? How does that deficiency occur? Is it in unpaid bills, or by the officers paying more than was appropriated?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are about twenty thousand dollars of unpaid bills; but they paid more—

Mr. CAMERON. Allow me to ask—

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me finish my question. Have the officers paid more than the amounts they have to their credit and which are appropriated?

Mr. CONKLING. They have transferred funds.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If Senators will allow me to explain in a general way, there will be less necessity for asking particular questions; but I will hear the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. I was going to say this: I am perfectly willing that the expenses of this trial should be paid; but I am not willing at this moment to appropriate $50,000 or any other number of thousands to the settlement of the accounts of the Secretary, for this reason: the Secretary is an officer of the Senate who gives security for a certain sum of money which goes into his hands, and I am not willing to appropriate any more money to put into his disbursement until we see what he did with that which he had.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This bill has not the slightest possible reference to anything he may have done, and it can in no possibility affect anything he has done. If anybody is curious to know what the Secretary of the Senate does with the money it is not his fault that they are not informed. There is a book which gives you the items. [Holding up one of the annual reports of the Secretary on the disbursements of the contingent fund.] My honorable friend from Indiana complains that the Senate is misinformed—does not know what becomes of the money. There is a book published last year, sent to you here at the commencement of the last Congress, and there is one which only awaits publication now, in which every item of expenditure is set down.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator if this book that is in his hand gives the items contained in this appropriation of $50,000?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; not in this book; but I say the Senator is complaining that we get no accounts from the Secretary of the Senate, while the Secretary of the Senate publishes, as it is his duty to publish, at the beginning of every Congress, the items of expenditure of the contingent funds of the Senate, and here they are. How creditable it would be to the Senate to have them read is another question.

Mr. HOWE. That is the report for the year before?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I say it is for the year before. I am only speaking of the general fact that if Senators are not informed on this subject it is not the fault of the Secretary of the Senate. I want to say another thing: that if anybody is at fault for the necessity of this deficiency bill it is not the officers of the Senate; it is the Senate itself.

Mr. CAMERON. It is time to correct it, then.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is time, I admit, to correct it; but it is hardly worth while for us to stand up here and make reflections in all directions. I do not allude to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] for I can understand that case; but I am more particularly addressing myself to my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who says that he does not know why this deficiency occurs. He might know if he would read this book which is published here; and if he would take notice of what transpires in the Senate he might know why it is. Why, sir, at the last session, in July, we had some seventeen additional messengers provided under a resolution of the Senate directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to put on an additional force to keep order; and what did we do? The last hour of that session we passed a resolution retaining all these messengers and all the pages and all the clerks during the recess of the Senate; and they were all on pay; and of course we all voted for it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There was no division, I think, on that subject.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I voted against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Pennsylvania voted against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I voted against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It went through. That is all I have said about it; and it became the privilege of these people to receive their pay; and now we are called upon to make an appropriation for a deficiency.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is not covered by this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, it is covered by this very bill, and the action of the Senate rendered it necessary; and yet Senators get up here and complain and are utterly amazed that we should have this appropriation bill, when it grows out of our own action.

Now, sir, let me go back for a moment to this appropriation of $50,000. There are about twenty thousand dollars of bills audited by the Committee on Contingent Expenses unpaid. I have not examined that matter. I take that from the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and also from the Secretary. They are unpaid. They are for furniture in part, for labor in part, and for a great variety of items, just such expenses as would naturally be incurred in such an establishment as this. Now, I say I went far enough with the cashier to satisfy myself that this deficiency actually does exist, and it exists in the way I have suggested; and the question is, whether the Senate will meet the deficiency and pay it, or whether we shall have these parties, these men who have been employed by our officers, calling upon us time after time for their bills, and be told "there is no money in the Treasury for the payment of these expenses." That is the precise question.

Now let me come to the next item:

For deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of the Capitol police.

Mr. HENDRICKS. How much is that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Seventeen thousand dollars. That arises, in great part, from the fact that we have added in contemplation of this trial, for some time back, twenty additional policemen. That is one of the items. The next is:

For deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of additional messengers, $15,000.

I have already spoken of that. Then the next item is:

For deficiency in the appropriation for defraying the expenses of hydration of the Senate Chamber.

My honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] can enlighten us upon that subject if it were necessary, but that is one of the ordinary expenses which have grown out of the attempt to hydrate the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is a small item.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is a small item, but it is one of the items.

Mr. HENDRICKS. How much is it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Three thousand dollars. Last year, I think, there was a deficiency of six or seven thousand dollars, and now we have another item of deficiency. I am only enumerating it, not to criticize it, but simply to account for the fact. Then another item in the bill is:

For deficiency in the appropriation for furniture and repairs, $5,000.

That grows out of the fact that since the last session you have fitted up, by order of the Senate, three or four committee-rooms.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from New Hampshire told us that that was connected with the miscellaneous appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the way he understands it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not so, as I understand it. The deficiency in miscellaneous items comes from having used that sum for furniture heretofore. Then here is another item:

For deficiency in the appropriation for clerks of committees, pages, horses, and carriages, $15,000.

All these clerks were put on the pay list during the entire recess of the Senate by a vote of the Senate; and hence comes this appropriation.

If there is any committee of this Senate who think they can get any more information on this subject than we have been able to obtain I should be glad to have this bill referred to that committee and have them ascertain the facts in a more satisfactory form to the Senate than we have been able to do. This committee have faithfully attended to this business. We called the cashier before us, and we are satisfied that these deficiencies actually do exist, and ought to be met; and they exist in the ways that I have suggested, chiefly from the action of the Senate itself, chiefly by allowing additional service here, and to a considerable extent growing out of the fact that we have been obliged in the last two or three months to provide for additional force about the Capitol.

I have not been able to see, I will say to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] that this bill has the slightest connection in the world with what he suggests. I do not controvert at all the propriety of his suggestion that perhaps some committee of the Senate ought to be charged with an examination of that particular subject; but I think my honorable friend will agree that it does not belong to the Committee on Appropriations to do it. The Committee on Appropriations having ascertained that these deficiencies do actually exist, that they have arisen, first, in the ordinary affairs of the Senate, and secondly, out of the extraordinary exigencies to which I have adverted, I submit, Senators, that you have as much of information on this subject as it is practicable to get, unless you are disposed to send it to a particular committee for particular investigation.

Mr. CRAGIN. There is one thing that I desire to say right here. The Senator from Maine says that these deficiencies actually exist. He means, of course, that these appropriations are to run on until the last of the fiscal year, the 1st of July next.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have stated that they cover the current year.

Mr. CRAGIN. That is what is meant. It is estimated what it will cost to pay clerks of committees and pay these other officers up to the 1st day of July next. Now, I wish to say one word more. There is one item here, an appropriation of $15,000 for additional messengers. These messengers have not received any pay since last January. There was no money to pay them for February or for March, and there will be none until this bill passes. I know that many of them are in great distress.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to say a few words with regard to this item of $50,000. I have nothing to say about the other items upon which the Senator from Maine has spoken. When this discussion commenced I did not fully understand it; I think I can now throw some light upon it. The honorable Senator from Maine has stated the condition of it in such a manner that I think I understand it. I have no doubt that somebody has an interest in getting this appropriation as large as possible. Who it is I do not know. I do not say it is an officer of the Senate. I know, of course, it is no member of the Senate. I do not say it is Mr. Forney or any other officer, but it is always the disposition of parties who are to have the use and advantage of money to make the appropriation as large as possible.

What did the Senator tell us in the first instance? He said this was for past expenses, in reply to my inquiry; and I understand him to say now, although there is a small item running to next July for the payment of certain messengers, that this is a deficiency for past expenses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This bill is to meet the deficiencies not provided for which already exist, and which will exist at the end of the current year. Of course it runs to the end of the year.

Mr. DIXON. So I understand. At first I understood the Senator to say that it was all for past expenses; but now I understand that some portion of it is to run for the fiscal year; but, of course, that is a small portion. Now, what does the Senator tell us? He tells us there are bills before the Committee on Contingent Expenses amounting to $20,000, which ought to be paid. Well, let them be paid; make an appropriation for their payment. There is no proper mode by which this money can be expended when appropriated except after having been audited by the honorable chairman of the committee. Here is $30,000 proposed to be appropriated which is not now due, and is not necessary now to be appropriated. I do not know who proposes this large expenditure. It attracted my attention in the first place because it was so much larger as a deficiency for contingent expenses than has heretofore been the case, and I knew of nothing which should occasion very great additional expense.

The honorable Senator speaks of the pay of witnesses. There is an appropriation in the bill for witnesses, or for the expenses of this impeachment trial. The Senator from New Hampshire says that that has been provided for partially in advance by an arrangement made by him with the Secretary of the Senate. That is provided for by the appropriation of $10,000 in this very bill. I have no doubt that the whole of this money comes properly under the head of contingent expenses; but I was going to ask the very question which was answered by the honorable Senator from Maine. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee what was the amount of the bills now before that committee which needed payment, if he could tell.

Mr. CRAGIN. If the Senator from Connecticut will give way, I will make a statement. He seems to argue to the Senate as though there were some twenty thousand dollars of bills that had not been presented to the committee, or had been presented and were not approved, or had not been paid. I can say to him and to others that there has been more money paid actually than has been appropriated for under this item; that is, $15,000 have been taken from other appropriations to pay under this one item, and there is an actual deficiency in addition to the bills which have not been presented and paid.

Mr. DIXON. If that is the case, then it is wholly wrong. That is an utterly improper mode of transacting business; and is a sufficient reason why this appropriation should not be made. I have no doubt that the object of having an appropriation of $50,000—of course I do not reflect on the chairman of either of the committees—is to very conveniently pay certain expenses which perhaps are proper; I do not know; I would not say they are improper; but they ought to be looked into. I now move to reduce this appropriation to $20,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order.

Mr. DIXON. The honorable chairman has stated to us that the bills now due and audited by the committee amount to $20,000. If so, let us make an appropriation to pay those, and then let us see what is necessary next to be done.

The Senator talks of deficiencies. That is a very convenient mode of explaining an expense which has been incurred. What does he mean by a deficiency? How do we know that it is a deficiency? Who is to pay it? Who is to audit it? There may be possibly a desire somewhere to have certain bills paid. Let them be presented to the committee; let the committee audit them, and when they are audited let them be paid; but I am utterly opposed to making in the dark an appropriation of $50,000 here, which is actually for the contingent fund of the Senate, without knowing what it is for, and especially when we are told that the whole amount of bills now before that committee, and really the whole amount of deficiency, is only $20,000. I therefore move to strike out "$50,000 and" insert "$20,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to make a statement, and I do so at the request of the Secretary, and I make it now so that it may go out with what has been stated here. He states that his first suspicions in regard to a deficiency occurred in November last. He called Mr. Wagner's attention to the subject, and Mr. Wagner made a voluntary admission that he had taken this money and had used it. He made a statement in writing, which is now in Colonel Forney's possession, and which any Senator can see. Mr. Wagner accounted for the greater part of the money. One item was that he owed $10,000 on some property in Pennsylvania, for which he was called upon sooner than he expected, and that he had taken out money for that purpose and for other purposes. Colonel Forney authorizes me to say that that voluntary statement is in his possession and can be seen at any time; and furthermore, that on finding this out every dollar was paid into the Treasury by him, as certified by the Comptroller.

Mr. CAMERON. In order to put this thing right I move that a committee be appointed to investigate the accounts of the Secretary of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. CAMERON. The statement made by the Senator from Nebraska comes in such a shape that I have no right to doubt its authenticity or its correctness; but I have great respect for the old man who was the pay clerk of the Secretary of the Senate. I have known him for twenty-five or thirty years myself, and I do not think there is a man in the whole State of Pennsylvania who knew him, as I said a while ago, who ever doubted his integrity. I do not think it is fair that that man's fame and character and all the labor of his long life should be destroyed by the single statement of a man now in authority. He is a relation of Mr. Forney's. He is a man of accounts. Nobody ever believed that Mr. Forney pretended to keep any accounts.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let us pass this bill, and then you can make your motion afterward.

Mr. CAMERON. If it can be agreed afterward to appoint a committee of investigation I will not object to the bill. With that understanding I shall not oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. The Senator from Maine has suggested that every Senator ought to have informed himself about this appropriation of $50,000 for miscellaneous items, and says that if we had read the book that he had in his hand it would have informed us.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not say that. I beg the Senator to be a little careful how he states me if he intends to represent what I said.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, by a combination of words and gestures, he made the impression on the Senate that by examining this book we would have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What I said was that if the Senator was not informed as to the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Senate it was his own fault, as it was the duty and the practice of the Secretary to publish it to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not admit that I am able to understand accounts merely because it is the duty of somebody to publish them who has not discharged that duty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But he has published them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This book to which the Senator refers is a report of the payments from the contingent fund of the Senate for the year ending December 3, 1866. It has not anything to do with this bill; and the Senator from Maine will not say that it has. But he says there is another book something like this, that is going to be published directly; and it is our own fault if we do not know what is in that. I wish I could know what is in all books in advance of their publication. It would save me a great deal of work in reading them after they came out. [Laughter.]

Now, I have thought it my duty to call attention to this appropriation of $50,000 for miscellaneous items which being for that we know nothing about. I have done it in good faith. My mind is not satisfied on the subject, and I think we ought to strike it all out. I will vote for the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut, to strike out $30,000 of it and leave it $20,000, though I would prefer to vote to strike it all out.

The Senator from Maine has referred to other items of this bill which I did not speak of at all, and among others is an appropriation of $17,000 for deficiency in the payment of the Capitol police. How did that deficiency occur? The salary of the Capitol police is fixed by law; their number is fixed by law. Who has appointed more policemen than the law allowed, and who has paid them more money than the law fixed for their salary, that there should be a deficiency? Then this bill provides "for additional policemen and incidental expenses thereof." What does that mean? That is an amendment inserted in the bill by the committee. What do you mean by providing for additional policemen? Upon whose recommendation? Upon what public necessity? What property is there to guard that is not sufficiently guarded that there should be this additional appropriation?

Mr. CRAGIN. Does the Senator want a reply?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not now; when I am through. "For additional policemen and incidental expenses thereof!" I do not take to policemen very readily. In most cities that I am acquainted with the public safety is really more endangered by the policemen than from the public; and as a general thing I would rather trust my person and my property in the custody of the common people than to the policemen, and for these particular policemen and their devotion to this country I have not so great an admiration since their proceedings yesterday, when they refused to let a soldier, because he carried the American flag, go on to the Dome of the Capitol, when every man, woman, and child in the United States has a right to go there. This is the class of men for whom we are going to appropriate $17,000 of additional money. For what purpose? I did not intend to speak of this until the Senator brought it out.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he knows the fact to exist as he has just stated it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not present. I know it a good deal in the same way that the Senator from New Hampshire said he knew how these accounts stood between Mr. Wagner and Colonel Forney, because somebody told him.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, I know he would not intentionally state an untruth.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was told by a person who said he was present that a policeman stopped this man, Sergeant Bates, and would not let him go upon the Dome of the Capitol with his flag, but took him in a hack and took him away from the Capitol, while the mass of persons were allowed to go into the Capitol. A gentleman who was present told me that.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand this to be the fact: that the Commissioner of Public Buildings gave an order to admit this Sergeant Bates to unfurl his flag from the Dome of the Capitol; that this order was presented to the Sergeant-at-Arms; that he wrote across it to the Capitol police to permit the sergeant to enter the building with the committee that attended him, but not to admit the populace, the crowd of miscellaneous persons who were present; and when this order written across the permission of the Commissioner was read the parties took personal offense and left.

Mr. THAYER. Perhaps I can add some information on this subject. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin acted as chairman of the committee of ceremonies on the occasion, and perhaps he can inform the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Oh, no; I did not.

Mr. THAYER. I mean the other Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this is to become important I will state—I was not chairman of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If this is not in order, I object. I want to know what has become of my bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear this.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was not present myself when Sergeant Bates undertook to enter the Rotunda of the Capitol. All I know of that is what Sergeant Bates told me this morning. He stated to me that when he arrived at the door of the Rotunda the captain of the police, or the person in charge, refused him admission; that is to say, refused his admission with his flag. If he desired personally to come into the Rotunda, he could do so; but he could not come in and bring the flag with him. He stated that he, or those who accompanied him, had the order of General Michler, allowing him to ascend with his flag to the Dome of the Capitol.

Mr. CAMERON. It was not the flag that was objected to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The flag was what was objected to, not the man. He applied for admission, and it was refused. It was refused upon the ground that it was necessary that the order of General Michler should be indorsed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. That was applied for by Mr. ELDRIDGE, of the House of Representatives, and obtained. Then Sergeant Bates attempted again to enter, and was again refused, because the order was not also indorsed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives. They searched about for the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, but were unable to find him. The people who accompanied Sergeant Bates were standing on the outside in the rain, and they found it was impossible for him to make an entrance with his flag. He applied for the privilege of coming in and putting his flag just in the Rotunda of the Capitol; and it was refused. Those are the facts as they were stated to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the committee, to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$40,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for a division.

Mr. CAMERON. I made no such motion as that.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I made the motion to restore the bill to the original amount. That was simply my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$40,000."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir; so as to leave the aggregate amount precisely as it was when the bill went to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is undoubtedly very sincere in his desire to reduce the bill and save a little money in that way, and rather than divide the Senate under the circumstances I think I will not object, but allow the honorable Senator to have his way in that fit of economy.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert after the word "police," in line fourteen, the words "and for additional policemen and additional expenses thereof;" so that the clause will read:

For deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of the Capitol police, and for additional policemen and incidental expenses thereof, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines twenty-one and twenty-two, in the following words:

For deficiency in the appropriation for stationery, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes."

ACCOUNTS OF SECRETARY OF SENATE.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. CAMERON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe I had the floor. Before a motion to adjourn is made I desire to submit a motion in regard to the subject which has just been discussed. I ask the Senator from New York to withdraw his motion for a moment to enable me to do so.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw it for the Senator.

Mr. CAMERON. I now move that the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate be instructed to investigate the accounts of the Secretary of the Senate and report to the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This, I suppose, is in the nature of a resolution. I do not object to it in form, but if we are to appoint a committee to examine into the conduct of our Secretary I think there is another subject that should be referred to them, and that is his conduct and proceedings, as an officer of the court of impeachment, in discussing the trial which is pending before the Senate acting as a court. I think that is a more important question, possibly, than the little matter of money.

Mr. CONKLING. If this is to give rise to debate I cannot withdraw my motion for that purpose. I withdrew it for a moment to hear a suggestion from the Senator.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator can hardly interpose his motion at this moment, while I am on the floor. I am not going to take time. I was going to propose to my colleague, for the purpose of simplification of the proceedings with reference to our Secretary, that the committee he proposes take both these subjects in charge.

Mr. WILSON and Mr. CONKLING. I hope not.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to have this matter of the accounts settled now, and after awhile I shall go with my colleague cheerfully; but now I beg to adhere to my original motion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will not insist upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to instruct the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to investigate the question mentioned by him.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 15, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that on the return of the House from the Senate to-day he will, in accordance with the right reserved, call the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. There will be business to be transacted upon the return of the House to this Hall.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. STEWART, Mr. HOLBROOK, and Mr. LAFLIN.

CALL OF THE STATES.

The SPEAKER stated that in accordance with the notification this morning he would call the States and Territories for bills and resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ACTING ASSISTANT SURGEONS' PENSIONS.

Mr. O'NEILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1011) supplementary to the several acts relative to pensions, proposing to extend their provisions to acting assistant surgeons disabled by wounds or disease while performing the duties of assistant or acting assistant surgeons; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RIGHTS OF RIPARIAN OWNERS.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1012) defining the rights of riparian owners of land acquired by purchase from the United States on the Menomonee river, in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

HITCHCOCK'S REVOLVING IRON FORTS.

Mr. HIGBY introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 252) in relation to Hitchcock's revolving iron forts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the joint select Committee on Ordnance.

MISS DOROTHY L. DIX.

Mr. MAYNARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1013) conferring the franking privilege upon Miss Dorothy L. Dix; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MEMPHIS, ETC., PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MAYNARD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1014) to aid the Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad Company of Texas in the construction of a railroad and line of telegraph from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government of the United States the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire, with the consent of the House, to offer a resolution, not for action at this time, but to go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House that cannot be done at this time. But the gentleman can now give notice that to-morrow he will ask leave to submit a resolution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then I will give notice that to-morrow, on the return of the House from the Senate Chamber, I will ask the House to take a recess until seven o'clock, in order to allow members who choose to make speeches an opportunity to do so without reference to any action of the House, but in order that those speeches may be published and sent to the country.

Allow me to say one word in relation to my reason for doing this, so that members may reflect upon it. It is now very plain that the Senate will not allow the managers on the part of the House to speak and lay before the public the reasons which they may have in support of the impeachment of the President, except so far as those who have been selected for that purpose may do so. And it is believed that there may be some advantage in laying before the country the reasons which they have.

I have, therefore, deemed it right to give notice of my intention to offer the resolution of which I refer, merely for the consideration to the House, not for its action at present; and I give the notice at this time in order that members may have until to-morrow to reflect upon it and determine whether it would be expedient to make such an arrangement as I have suggested, in order that speeches may be made. I know there are four or five very able speeches written, not by the managers only, but by others, on the subject of impeachment. Whether or not it would be prudent to make such an arrangement is a question for the consideration of members. I give this notice now in order that I may not be concluded to-morrow from submitting the proposition to the House.

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House no business can be transacted this afternoon except that of which notice was given; that is, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference merely, in order to accommodate members who have bills which they desire to get before committees for consideration.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] have already given notice that to-morrow, on the return of the House to this Hall, they will endeavor to get the House to dispose of the pending resolution in relation to the printing of Manager BUTLER's argument, and then to have action taken on the bill in regard to the rights of American citizens in foreign States. The Chair would therefore suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that Friday would be a better time than to-morrow for an evening session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] if he proposes that the managers shall make their speeches to the House instead of to the Senate?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was about to make the same inquiry. It looks as if it was a proposition to make the arguments here in the House before the case is closed in the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. All I can say to the gentleman is that it looks very much now as if the trial were fast approaching its close. I have already said that I have given notice of this proposition as a precautionary measure, so that I may not be precluded from offering it to-morrow or next day if I choose to do so. I am not sure that I shall offer it.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. I desire to inquire of my colleague [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania] whether the object of this proposition is to forestall the action of the Senate in regard to how many speeches shall be made in closing the impeachment trial?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. As I understand, the Senate has decided that matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, and the pending question is upon ordering the main question on the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing relative to the publication of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, the pending question being undebatable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to indulge in any debate. I simply desire to ask of the Committee on Printing that they shall report the resolution I offered with reference to the publication of the argument of Judge Curtis, so that the House may act on the matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not call the regular order for the purpose of cutting off that proposition.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What I desire is that the House shall act on the two propositions together. Unless this be assented to, I shall feel it my duty to require the presence of a quorum to act upon this question. If both propositions be acted on at the same time, there will be no objection on this side of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. The chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. LAFLIN] is not now present.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of many citizens of Chester and Delaware counties, in Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a law extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia to women.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of Mrs. Sarah Johnston, praying for a pension.

Also, two petitions from 200 citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of the bill to authorize the building of a railroad from Washington to Cincinnati.

By Mr. FERRISS: A memorial of John H. Ryenson and 100 others, citizens of New York city, in favor of a national railroad between the commercial and Federal capitals of the nation.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A memorial of Lawrence Wall, for arrears of pension.

By Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire: The vote of the town of Hillsborough, in New Hampshire, in favor of the taxation of United States bonds.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana: The petition of Marshal N. Snodgrass, for pension.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 16, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m., when, on motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 16, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FIELD and Mr. KITCHEN obtained leave of absence indefinitely, and Mr. ARCHER till next Monday.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. There will be business to be transacted upon the return of the House to this Hall.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

NEW MEXICO CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House evidence in the contested-election case of Chaves vs. Clever, from the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House proceedings of the Legislature of Arkansas upon the ratification of the fourteenth constitutional amendment; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

CRIMES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1015) to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," approved April 30, 1790, so as to extend the time within which certain offenses may be prosecuted; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the reference of all those bills and other propositions be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. During the pendency of the President's trial in the Senate such is the order of the House that bills and joint resolutions shall be introduced for reference only and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

VALLEJO AND HUMBOLDT BAY RAILROAD.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1016) granting lands to the State of California for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Vallejo to Humboldt bay; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

OSAGE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to immediately suspend the sale of all lands ceded and sold to the United States by treaty with Great and Little Osage Indians, proclaimed January 20, 1837, and now advertised to take place at Humboldt, Kansas, on and after the 1st of May next.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to its being referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. If the gentleman will listen to a short explanation he will not object to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. It is an important matter, and should go to a committee.

Subsequently Mr. RANDALL withdrew his objection, and the resolution was adopted.

SPEECH OF MANAGER BUTLER.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is, "Shall the main question be ordered to be now put on the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing for the printing of forty thousand copies of the opening speech of Manager BUTLER in the trial of the President of the United States?"

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] moved an amendment to that resolution, which the Chair decided could not be received; that under the law it must be referred to the Committee on Printing. Desiring that nothing shall be done which will be unequal or unjust in this matter, I move that the pending resolution, with the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, for the printing of Mr. Curtis's speech, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin has already been referred to that committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object to it. They do not stand upon the same footing. The speech of Manager BUTLER is the speech of an officer of this House in the discharge of an official act.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not controvert that; but let both go to the committee for consideration.

Mr. CHANLER. I make the point that debate is not in order.

Mr. KELSEY. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. A quorum, or nearly so, is present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us see first, by a count, whether a quorum is present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what I desire.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 27; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. ELDRIDGE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 22; still no quorum voting.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HIGBY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHANLER called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House then refused to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 59, noes 20.

The roll was accordingly called; when the following-named members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Allison, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Churchill, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Gravely, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moore, Morgan, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Sigreaves, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state before the doors are closed and the call proceeded in, if that be the order of the House, that ninety-four members have answered to their names, which, with the Speaker, would make one less than a quorum. The Chair was desired by a sub-committee of the Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. SCHENCK, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. HOOPER of Massachusetts, to state that they are in consultation in the transaction of their business in a room at the Treasury Department, and will come whenever sent for when the House proceeds to business.

Mr. KELSEY. If we adjourn now, will this business be the first thing in order to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would be except for the order that the House shall, at twelve o'clock, proceed to the Senate Chamber. If notice be given, it will be resumed when the House returns from the Senate Chamber.

Mr. KELSEY. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment to enable me to have a bill from the Senate referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KELSEY. I withdraw the motion.

SENATE CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 462) making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, and other contingent expenses of the Senate for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINCOLN] to state that the report of the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relative to the claim of J. E. Reeside for services as a contractor, was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The Chair stated at the time the communication was presented that he thought it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, but the House ordered it to be referred to the Post Office Committee on account of the name of the contractor. It appears that the Chair was correct, and, if there be no objection, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will be discharged from the further consideration of the report, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

POST ROUTE IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1017) to extend a mail route from Serena to Ottawa, in the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. KELSEY. Can less than a quorum of the House dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. DRIGGS, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHANLER: A memorial of members of the New York Corn Exchange, in favor of the construction of the New York and Washington railway, and asking for the passage of the bill now before Congress.

By Mr. COBB: The petition of General J. B. Moore and others, for a post route from Muscoda, Grant county, to Richland Center, Richland county, Wisconsin.

Also, the petition of David Dudley and others, for same.

Also, the petition of C. F. A. Johnson and others, for same.

Also, the petition of Daniel Randall and others, for same.

Also, the petition of L. Powers and others, for same.

By Mr. WOODWARD: A memorial of the Philadelphia Drug Exchange.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 17, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

SALE OF IRON-CLADS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, relative to the sale of certain iron-clads, in compliance with the act of February 2, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

COTTON CLAIMS.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Court of Claims be directed to inform this House of the number of judgments rendered in the said Court of Claims in the cotton claims, the amount thereof, and in whose favor rendered, and also to state the nature and character of the claims presented, and by what attorneys prosecuted.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House with a statement which shall show the amount of tax collected on distilled spirits since the 1st day of January last.

PRINTING OF IMPEACHMENT REPORT.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and are hereby, requested to order to be printed ten thousand additional copies of the impeachment trial for the use of the members of this House, to be by them distributed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. As a quorum of the House is now in the city, the Chair, under the authority given him by the House, will announce that if upon any day the House shall return to the Hall before three o'clock it may be expected that business will be transacted. If the House shall not return until after that time then no business will be done, unless special notice shall have been previously given.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will any business be done this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. No notice has been given of any. The Chair will make the announcement, if any gentleman desires, that business may be expected when the House returns this afternoon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no; I hope not.

The SPEAKER. No notice has yet been given.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is there a quorum of the House here?

The SPEAKER. There are one hundred and ten members in the city.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

The SPEAKER. As the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock, if there be no objection the House will meet at that hour.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I think the objection was not made in time.

Mr. WOOD. I submit that I made the objection in time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection was in time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now take a recess until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. WOOD. I submit there is no quorum present, and it is not competent to change any rules of the House.

The question was taken upon the motion for a recess; and upon a division there were—ayes 27, noes 10; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. As it requires a quorum for the House to take a recess the Speaker now gives notice that at eleven o'clock to-morrow morning he will be here with the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] and, as a matter of respect to the Senate, will, with such members as may be here, attend the managers to the bar of the Senate; and at twelve o'clock he will take his seat as Speaker of the House in this Hall.

Mr. WOOD. I raise the question of order whether that will be the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York raises a question of order which the Chair declines to entertain.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

MEMORIALS.

The following memorials were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. KELSEY: A memorial of William B. Ogden, Abram C. Bell, and others, praying for the passage of House bill No. 621, which provides for a military and postal road between Washington, District of Columbia, and the city of New York.

By Mr. NIBLACK: A memorial of Andrew Reinfort, late of company B, fifty-eighth regiment of Indiana volunteers, praying for a pension.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 18, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at three o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the hour of meeting hereafter, until further order of the Senate, be at eleven o'clock each day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the consideration of the proposed order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the Senator from California to move that hereafter the Senate meet at eleven o'clock, not the court of impeachment.

Mr. CONNESS. What is necessary to be done the Senate will know.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from California can vary his motion.

Mr. CONNESS. To get out of this difficulty I move that the Senate adjourn until eleven o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that eleven o'clock be the time for meeting until otherwise ordered. Several SENATORS. Order! order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That infringes a rule of the Senate, and, objection having been made, cannot be considered now. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, that the Senate adjourn to meet on Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 18, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. The Chair will add that it being manifestly unseemly that during the defense, which is now progressing, the deliberations of the Senate should be disturbed by an announcement, the Chair has notified the Chief Justice, presiding in the Senate on the trial of the impeachment, that he will not expect an announcement of the members and officers of the House on their appearance at this hour.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At three o'clock and forty minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until next Monday at eleven o'clock a. m.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that when the objection was made yesterday to changing the hour of meeting of the House of Representatives to correspond with the hour which the Senate had fixed for the commencement of the trial upon each day, it was the impression of the Speaker, as well as of the Journal clerk, that that question had been already settled by the House. But the Journal was not then at hand; and as several gentlemen upon the right of the Chair insisted that the absence of a quorum should be disclosed for the purpose of preventing the order being made, the Chair did not desire, upon his mere recollection, to make a decision which might take from them a right possessed by them under the rules. An examination of the Journal, however, shows that the recollection of the Chair was correct. The Clerk will read from the Journal the action of the House upon this subject on the 20th of March.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. BOUTWELL, from the managers in the matter of the impeachment of the President, (the rules having been suspended for that purpose,) reported the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, namely:

"Resolved, That on the days when the Senate shall sit for the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives the House, in Committee of the Whole, will attend with the managers at the bar of the Senate at the hour named for the commencement of the proceedings."

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that, the Senate having fixed eleven o'clock a. m. as the hour at which the trial shall daily commence, the hour of meeting of the House is, under the resolution just read, (which was adopted under a suspension of the rules,) changed to eleven o'clock a. m. so long as the Senate may meet at that hour for the continuation of the trial, unless the order of the House should be rescinded, which can only be done when a quorum is present.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Elizabeth Morton, mother of Corporal William H. Morton, late of company B, twenty-fifth New York volunteers, for arrears of pension.

Also, the petition of Rose O'Connor, guardian of minor children of Edward Corrigan, deceased, for arrears of pension.

Also, a memorial of the Drug Exchange of Philadelphia, for a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits to fifty cents per gallon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that when the House returns from the Senate this afternoon I shall move to take up and pass Senate bill No. 462, making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and other contingent expenses of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also desires to give notice, as the session of the Senate may not be lengthy to-day, that business may be expected on the return of the House. There will be a report from the Committee on Printing in regard to the number of copies to be ordered to be printed of the impeachment proceedings, as the Congressional Printer desires to know, while the type is standing, what the wish of the House may be.

SABINE.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Secretary of the Navy, on the application of certain persons not officially connected with the administration of the Navy Department, recently caused the Sabine, a vessel belonging to the United States Navy, to be detained for several days in the harbor of New London, after said vessel had been ordered out of commission and away from said harbor of New London, at an expense of more than twenty thousand dollars and to the prejudice of the public service; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House the number of days said vessel was detained, and the reason of said detention; the number of men connected with said vessel, and the daily and aggregate expense of said vessel and men while thus detained; also to communicate the entire correspondence that passed between the Navy Department and Hon. Frederick L. Allen, Hon. James Dixon, the Democratic committee of New London, and any other person or persons in regard to this subject, together with a copy of the "descriptive list" of said vessel now in the possession of the Navy Department, a copy of all of the orders of said Department on this subject, and also a copy of all letters and telegrams sent and received in relation to the same; also a copy of any letter or letters or telegrams relating to this subject exhibited by any person or persons asking for the detention of said vessel for partisan or political purposes, or for other reasons; also to communicate to this House what representations, verbal or otherwise, were made on this subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will move to suspend the rules on the return of the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I will.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of eleven o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, to proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Door-keeper.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At one o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until next Wednesday at eleven o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. In consequence of the adjournment of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President of the United States until Wednesday next, the House will meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock m., for the transaction of its ordinary business. While the House was in the Senate the morning hour expired; but if there be no objection, this being Monday, the States and Territories will be called for bills and resolutions for reference only, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know if the order of the House does not operate upon its action to-day, and whether any notice of business was given?

The SPEAKER. It was given by the Chair and also by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was not in at the time.

The SPEAKER. Notice was given that business would be transacted, and the nature of some of the business was stated.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I know that many gentlemen are absent with the expectation that nothing would be done.

The SPEAKER. Notice was given by the Chair that business would be done, and the Chair stated that the Committee on Printing desire to report on the proposition to print a certain number of copies of all the impeachment proceedings, including the speeches on both sides and the evidence.

The SPEAKER then proceeded with the call of the States and Territories.

CLAIMS OF BRITISH CITIZENS.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law that no claims of British citizens for the proceeds of captured and abandoned property shall be allowed by the Court of Claims or any executive department of the Government of the United States until the claims of citizens of the United States for spoliation committed by rebel cruisers fitted out by British citizens or in British ports shall be adjusted and provision made for their payment; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

SAFETY OF RAILROAD PASSENGERS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. VAN AUKEN for one week, and to Mr. POLSLEY for three weeks.

ARGUMENT OF MANAGER BUTLER.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Printing, on the 8th of March, on which the previous question was seconded:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of this House five thousand copies of the opening address of Hon. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, one of the Managers on the part of the House of Representatives on the trial of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, before the Senate, with the accompanying brief of law authorities, and forty thousand copies without the accompanying brief.

When this resolution was last under consideration the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded upon the resolution. The question was taken, and no quorum voted. That is now the pending question, and the Chair will appoint Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. ELDRIDGE to act as tellers.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 50, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. BANKS. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope unanimous consent will be given to have this resolution recommitted to the Committee on Printing, who will, no doubt, adjust this whole matter to the satisfaction of this House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. There is no objection on this side of the House to that being done.

Mr. BANKS. If that can be done, I will withdraw my motion for a call of the House.

No objection being made, the motion for a call of the House was withdrawn, and the resolution was recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

CENTAL SYSTEM.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, presented the resolutions adopted by the St. Louis Merchants' Exchange, concerning the cental system; which were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 768, concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

Mr. BANKS obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have been directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back to this House Senate bill No. 462, making appropriations for the expenses of the impeachment trial, and one other item not connected with that subject. I hope there will be no objection to its consideration at this time.

Mr. BANKS. I do not think I can yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is a matter of great public necessity, and I suppose the gentleman will not object to it if no one else objects to it.

Mr. BANKS. If there is no objection to the bill I will yield.

No objection was made.

EXPENSES OF IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back Senate bill No. 462, making appropriations for the expenses of the trial of Andrew Johnson, and other contingent expenses of the Senate, for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPALDING. I would inquire if there are any amendments reported to this bill?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will inform my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SPALDING] that this is the same bill which was considered in the committee this morning.

Mr. SPALDING. I know there was one matter left undetermined. I want to know what was done with the $40,000 item.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will explain that.

Mr. BANKS. I must object to this bill being considered now if there is to be any lengthened discussion upon it.

Mr. CHANLER. Let there be five minutes' explanation.

Mr. BANKS. Very well.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill contains several items: one of $10,000 for the expenses of the impeachment trial; one of $40,000; and then an item of $17,000 to pay the Capitol police. The Committee on Appropriations have directed me to report those three items, proposing to leave the other items to abide the fate of the ordinary deficiency bill. If the House proceed to the consideration of this bill I shall move, in addition to what the committee report in favor of, the appropriation of $15,000 to pay the laborers over there, who, I understand, have not had a dollar of pay since last December.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is the aggregate amount of the items in the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There are items of $10,000, $40,000, $17,000, and $15,000.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand that the appropriation of $15,000 is not already in the bill, but that the gentleman from Illinois proposes to add it as an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is in the bill now; but the Committee on Appropriations of the House decline to recommend the adoption of that item, for the reason that they thought it should go into the ordinary deficiency bill; but in consequence of an explanation I have had this morning—and I make this statement more particularly for the benefit of my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING]—in regard to these messengers, who have waited since last December for their pay, I propose upon my own responsibility to ask the House to adopt the appropriation providing for their compensation. The House can vote for the proposition or not, according to its own judgment.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to know what the item of $40,000 is for? The committee has not been informed upon that subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to explain.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask one other question?

I wish to inquire whether this bill contains any "cat under the meal," which is to be brought to view by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] or the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK?] I wish to know whether we are to be entrapped, as we were on a former occasion?

Mr. SPALDING. Oh, no; you are not to be entrapped.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have not seen any "cat under the meal."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is an appropriation bill, and does not now contain any legislation; and if any should be proposed it would not be in order, not being germane to the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] has any reason to believe that the Committee on Appropriations would foist anything upon the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir. I will do the gentleman the justice to say that I do not believe he would do anything of that kind; but the gentleman will remember that once, when we gave unanimous consent for an apparently unobjectionable bill, we found ourselves in the dilemma of being entrapped.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust the House will never be deceived by anything which I may state.

I wish now to say a word in reply to the inquiry of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] I was directed by the Committee on Appropriations to inquire into the item of $40,000 for miscellaneous expenses. It is for a great number of expenses for which the vouchers are filed in the Senate. I have not had time to go over them; but I have been assured by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, one of the most careful and correct men who has ever had charge of appropriation bills, that he went over these items carefully, one by one, and that they are amounts actually due. Under this statement of the circumstances I have thought it my duty, under my instructions from the committee, to consent to that item.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask my colleague on the committee whether he has learned that these expenditures are for legitimate purposes in the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Entirely so.

Mr. SPALDING. Are they connected with the impeachment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They are not all connected with the impeachment; but they are all for legitimate purposes, as I have been informed by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations. I conferred with him this morning, and he said that if I would refer to the debate as reported in the Globe I would find the matter all explained. I have not, however, had time to do so. With these remarks I leave the question to the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill as passed by the Senate will be read.

The bill, which was read, proposes to make the following appropriations for the payment of the expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, and other contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1868: for expenses of the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, $10,000; for miscellaneous items, $40,000; for deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of the Capitol police, and for additional policemen and incidental expenses thereof, $17,000; for deficiency in the appropriation for the payment of additional messengers, $15,000; for deficiency in the appropriation for defraying the expense of hydration of the Senate Chamber, $3,000; for deficiency in the appropriation for furniture and repairs, $5,000; for deficiency in the appropriation for clerks to committees, pages, horses, and carriages, $15,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I will again state that the Committee on Appropriations agreed to recommend the striking out of all the items except the three first. I propose on my own responsibility to submit to the House the question whether it will adopt the fourth item, which proposes to appropriate $15,000 for the back pay of these messengers.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on striking out the following items:

For deficiency in the appropriation for defraying the expense of hydration of the Senate Chamber, $3,000.

For deficiency in the appropriation for furniture and repairs, $5,000.

For deficiency in the appropriation for clerks to committees, pages, horses, and carryalls, $15,000.

The question was taken, and the items were stricken out.

Mr. SPALDING. I now move to strike out the appropriation of $40,000 for miscellaneous expenses. I ask my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations whether it will not answer just as well to provide for this appropriation in the deficiency bill?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am advised that it will not; that it is absolutely necessary this appropriation should be made now to carry on the present operations of the Senate.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman who reported this bill. I noticed in the debates of the Senate that some controversy grew up in relation to this $40,000 appropriation, in which it was said it was to be applied to a deficiency which occurred in the payment of money in the Senate. Now I wish to ask whether this sum of $40,000 is to be applied to the payment of laborers, and has no reference whatever to the charge that it is to supply a deficiency which I saw stated in the debates of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What was that?

Mr. WELKER. In relation to the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Not in the least.

Mr. WELKER. It was stated that there was a difficulty between the Secretary of the Senate and his financial clerk as to the sum of $40,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That was in regard to another matter, and did not come up in this bill at all as a matter of legislation, as I understand.

Mr. WELKER. This, then, has nothing whatever to do with it?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It has not.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not think that we ought to pass an item of $40,000 without knowing more about it than we do about this one. We have already passed one deficiency bill for the Senate to make up a deficit in its appropriations. This comes upon us, not as an ordinary deficiency bill, but as a special bill to provide for the expenses of the impeachment trial. I propose to strike out this item and give the committee further time to look into this item of $40,000, and see what it is made up of. That is all. It will only be for a week or two. I insist on my motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the Committee on Appropriations have already ascertained that $10,000 are anything like an adequate sum to pay the expenses of the impeachment trial? It seems to me it will amount to a great deal more. Or is this merely at once to strike the public mind as all the expense of the trial? Is it not designed to sugar-coat this pill of impeachment?

The SPEAKER. That is not germane to the pending question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I put the question to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will answer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If these $10,000 be not sufficient to meet the expense, it seems to me that the committee ought to meet this question boldly and appropriate enough to pay the whole expense, so the people may know all about it.

The SPEAKER. The debate must be confinied to the pending proposition, to strike out $40,000.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not insist that my question shall be answered at once; but I do want an answer.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will state first in answer to my honorable colleague on the committee that we might almost as well not pass the bill at all as to strike out this item of $40,000. It is for contingent expenses, and it is absolutely necessary the Senate should have it. The gentleman from Ohio knows I would not urge anything unless I thought it necessary and proper; and I think if he had the consultation I had, as I was instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to examine into the items of this appropriation, with the chairman of the Senate Committee, he would be entirely satisfied in regard to this amount.

Mr. SPALDING. In reply to my excellent colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, I will say that I am most commonly governed by his opinion in regard to these matters. It is due to myself to say that this morning when this bill was before the Committee on Appropriations for ten minutes, I agreed that the gentleman should examine into this item as to how it is made up; and he agreed with me that it should not come in here before the House under the head of "contingencies," but that we should give it a substantial name and let the people see what they were paying the money for. Was not that the understanding? Now, if my colleague on the committee is satisfied in this respect and will tell me he is, I will withdraw my proposition.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not wish my friend to withdraw anything on my account. I have no particular interest in this matter; but I can tell my colleague on the committee and the House in regard to this matter as I understand it. I am as much indisposed as my colleague or anybody else is to having these general miscellaneous items in any of the appropriation bills. This is not for contingent expenses; it is for "miscellaneous items." We all agreed in the committee—I can say that without any violation of the rule—that this was a subject to be inquired into. I went and made inquiry. I could, perhaps, have gone through these vouchers and looked them over myself; but I was assured by the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate that he had gone over these items very thoroughly, being very reluctant indeed to permit the appropriation to be made, but he was forced to it from the state of financial matters there, and hence the Senate passed upon this question. They found that this amount was necessary, and it is a courtesy which has always been accorded by one House to the other to permit each House to judge to some extent of what its needs are for miscellaneous items.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to make an inquiry. I wish to inquire if my friend is clear that this is for "miscellaneous," and not for "contingent" expenses? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does my friend think it makes any very great difference?

Mr. DAWES. I only want to get at the fact, for I think it will govern my vote. I do not think I could be induced to vote for it if it is for "contingent" expenses; but I do not know what I might be induced to do if it is for "miscellaneous" expenses. I therefore desire to withhold my views until I know what this is for.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should very much like to have an expression of my friend's views on this subject as on all others.

Mr. DAWES. I make the inquiry because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] said that he and his friend from Illinois—his excellent friend—had agreed that they would not go for this appropriation if it was for "contingent" expenses; and now the gentleman from Illinois comes in and says that he still goes with his excellent friend from Ohio, and that it is not for "contingent" expenses, but for "miscellaneous" expenses. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope my friend is satisfied. I will tell him what one of the items is, and he can judge for himself. It is for the funeral expenses of the Senator from Vermont, the late Mr. Foot, and it is a very large item, too, I am sorry to say.

Mr. DAWES. Well, that is miscellaneous.

Mr. SPALDING. I have accomplished my purpose. I merely wished the House to understand that the Committee on Appropriations did not understand how this sum was made up. That purpose is accomplished, and I now do not desire to be captious but withdraw my motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. We think here upon this side of the House that $10,000 cannot begin to pay the expenses of impeachment, that is a mere bagatelle, that the expenses must amount to many times that sum. I do not suppose there is a gentleman here who doubts that it will cost twenty times that sum.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. So far as I am concerned, if it is a success, I would be willing to vote $100,000.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. So far as I am concerned, I would not vote any sum of money to carry it through.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not think the money could be used for any better purpose, but I do not want it used for any illegitimate purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish the gentleman to answer my question. Does he mean to say that this item of $10,000 is for the purpose of obtaining success, and that if he was sure he could get success he would vote ten times that sum? Does he propose by this legislation to affect the action of the Senate in that way? Is that the candor of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Of course the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] does not understand me to say any such thing. He must have understood me to say this: that the Senate that has charge of and is conducting this trial has said that it wants $10,000 for the purposes of the trial. I do not know whether it is sufficient or insufficient. The Senate has asked for this amount, and I am in favor of appropriating it. And if any other amount shall become due I shall be in favor of making an appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to know if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] means to stand by the remark he made, that if he could have the impeachment a success he would vote $100,000?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I said that if the impeachment should be a success it would be worth not only $10,000, but $100,000. And if it will be any satisfaction to the gentleman, I will say to him that it would be worth $100,000,000. [Applause in the galleries, promptly checked by the Speaker.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not suppose the gentleman can be candid upon this subject. I do not suppose that he or this House expects that the sum of $10,000 will be all that will be necessary for the expenses of the impeachment trial. It is a mere bagatelle for the purpose of favorably affecting the popular mind toward impeachment while the trial is progressing before the Senate.

The gentleman from Illinois admits that when he says that he would appropriate not only $10,000 but $100,000 if impeachment could be made a success. And he then adds, with the approbation of his fellows and the applause of their followers of the galleries, that he would be willing to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for that purpose. Sir, that is not worthy of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE:] it is unworthy of this House to say here, when this trial is pending before the Senate, one of the most august trials the world has ever seen, that we would appropriate this large sum of money for the purpose of making impeachment a success; or that we have any such interest or feeling in regard to it as that, under the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] that we would even give that sum for the purpose of making it a success; or that if it were a success we would be willing to pay that amount. Sir, I would not be willing to give one dollar or one cent for that or any such purpose. Let the trial go on under the strict, the simple rules and principles of justice, unaffected and uninfluenced by money or the interest this House may feel on account of its action heretofore taken or its political bias. If this sum of $10,000 is named merely for the purpose of striking the public mind at this time as the probable expense of the impeachment I say that such action is unworthy of this House. We ought to meet the question fully and fairly, and let the country understand precisely what we believe the expense of that trial may be; at all events, not endeavor to deceive or cheat the people in regard to it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to say but a word or two. As I said before, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] does not at all misunderstand the proposition which I submitted to the House. And he cannot put his own misconstruction before the country without explanation. He may undertake to lecture the House, he may undertake to lecture me, in regard to what is the duty of the House or what my duty may be, but I will not permit him to misrepresent what I have said here. Now, what I did say in regard to this proposition was this: that if impeachment was a success it would be worth hundreds of millions of dollars to this country, and I so believe. It would be worth hundreds of millions of dollars in what it would save to the country from the amount which is plundered from the Treasury by the office-holders who have been thrust into office by the gentleman from Wisconsin and his party. It would be worth hundreds of millions of dollars, it would be worth uncounted millions, in the lives of the loyal men of the South which would be saved by thrusting this acting President forth from the White House. That, sir, is what I said; and the House and the country will not misunderstand me, but will agree with me, and will agree with that verdict of guilty which I trust the Senate will render on this subject. Now, sir, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVALS, ETC., IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MULLINS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to furnish to this House information as to how many removals of clerks and other employes of said Department have been made since the 1st day of January, 1868, and for what cause; also, how many persons have been appointed to office or employed in the Treasury Department since said 1st day of January, 1868; and by whom the removals and appointments were made, and the names of those removed and of those appointed or employed; also, the reasons for the same.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. I object.

SALES OF UNITED STATES BONDS, ETC.

Mr. LOGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to at once comply with the following resolution, passed March 18, 1868:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed, without delay, to report to this House the amount of commissions paid for sale or disposal of United States bonds or securities since the 2d day of March, 1862; to whom paid, and if commissions are still paid for similar services to the same parties; if not, to whom commissions have been paid by the Treasury Department since the 2d day of March, 1861, and what amount of commissions have been paid on sales of gold, and to whom paid; whether said commissions on sales of gold were paid in coin or currency; that he state separately the amount of commissions paid on the sales of Government securities and sales of gold."

GUARDS AT WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the General of the Army be directed to inform the House why the office of the War Department is surrounded by armed men, and whether, in his opinion, it is necessary that able-bodied soldiers should be thus employed in time of peace, and how many men are similarly employed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman include the same inquiry with regard to Secretary Seward's office?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am willing to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I object to the resolution.

PUBLICATION OF SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the publication by the several Departments of the Government of all soldiers' claims which have been allowed and paid by such Department, such publication to be made in a newspaper published in the capital of each State respectively, and made monthly or quarterly, of all such claims paid during the last preceding month or quarter, to the end that claim agents may not be able to retain soldiers' pay and bounty for an unnecessary time after its collection; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

WASHINGTON BUILDING BLOCK COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1020) to incorporate the Washington Building Block Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

SALE OF PUBLIC VESSELS.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish the information asked for in the following resolution adopted by this House on the 12th day of December last, and which remains unanswered:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the House, in connection with the information this day called for in relation to the number and price of the public vessels sold since the war, whether any of the vessels so sold were captured from the enemy during the war and upon which prize money was paid by the United States, and if so, the amount of prize money so paid, the date of payment, and the price for which the vessels were sold."

Mr. BANKS. I do not yield to that resolution if it takes up time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand this to be offered by my colleague.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House until the Chair ascertains whether it is objected to or not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not object to it; but I wish to call attention to a fact in connection with another matter. It seems that the Secretary of the Navy declines to answer any request made to him. I submitted a resolution calling upon him for information so long ago as the 12th of January, and perhaps before, and although I have often called his attention to it, still he has never yet responded to it. His course is unprecedented, and I hope we shall take such measures as will vindicate the dignity of this House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What resolution does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. VAN AUKEN. The gentleman makes me believe that I ought to object to this resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It was in reference to vessels bought and sold on commission, and a variety of other information was asked for.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has the resolution never been answered?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It has never been answered to this day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Were not those the vessels sold by the present acting Secretary of War?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. I object to the resolution.

THOMAS CHITTENDEN.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back Senate bill No. 340, for the relief of Thomas Chittenden, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

The motion was agreed to.

SYLVANUS BLODGETT.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 317, granting an increase of pension to Sylvanus Blodgett, of Jericho, Chittenden county, Vermont, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. PIERHAM, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and the same were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812:

Petition of Abner Duncan, of Virginia, praying for a special act, &c.; and Petition of John McIlwee and five other citizens, asking for a pension for military services as a soldier in the war of 1812.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the same committee were discharged from the further consideration of the following, and the same were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 932) for the relief of the heirs of Sarah Smith; and Petition of Ann Shelly, for a pension.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask unanimous consent to report, from the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, a short bill making amendments to the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER. For action at the present time?

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, sir. It is very short.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. Will it give rise to debate?

Mr. JENCKES. It will not. I ask five minutes for explanation.

Mr. BANKS. I yield five minutes, reserving my right to object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I give notice to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I shall probably want to debate this matter. I think I am opposed to the bill of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. JENCKES. I think not, if the gentleman will hear it.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman reserve his objection until the bill is read?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well, sir.

The Clerk commenced to read the bill.

Mr. BANKS. I must resume the floor. It is perfectly apparent that that bill cannot be considered without some discussion.

Mr. JENCKES. Then, if the gentleman will allow me, I will ask that the bill may be reported and printed in the Globe, in order that it may be called up to-morrow on a motion to reconsider. I do not think it will give rise to any discussion whatever.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent to have the bill reported and left so that it can be called up to-morrow by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is no objection to the bill being reported, recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKS. That will not give the bill precedence.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

The bill (H. R. No. 1021) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, was read a first and second time, recommended to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed; and also ordered to be printed in the Globe.

The SPEAKER stated that a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommended would be regarded as laid upon the table.

The bill is as follows:

A bill in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the second clause of the thirty-third section of said act shall not apply to the cases of proceedings in bankruptcy commenced prior to the 1st day of June, A. D. 1869, and the time during which the operation of the provisions of said clause is postponed shall be extended until said 1st day of June, A. D. 1869; and said clause is hereby so amended as to read as follows: in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st day of June, 1869, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as principal debtor, who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said act be further amended, as follows: the phrase "presented or defended" in the fourteenth section of said act shall read "prosecuted and defended," the phrase "non-resident debtors," in line five, section twenty-two, of the act as printed in the Statutes-at-Large, shall read "non-resident creditors;" that the word "or" in the next to the last line of the thirty-ninth section of the act shall read "and;" that the phrase "section thirteen" in the forty-second section of said act shall read "section eleven;" and the phrase "or spends any part thereof in gaining" in the forty-fourth section of said act shall read "or shall spend any part thereof in gaining;" and that the words "with the senior register, or," and the phrase "to be delivered to the register," in the forty-seventh section of said act, be stricken out.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That registers in bankruptcy shall have power to administer oaths in all cases and in relation to all matters in which oaths may be administered by commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States; and such commissioners may take proof of debts in bankruptcy in all cases, subject to the revision of such proofs by the register and by the court, according to the provisions of said law.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the pending question being upon the motion of Mr. BANKS, to recommit the bill.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House has been for a long time under consideration, and I have taken every possible opportunity to press it for final action in the House. I do not wish now to consume the time of the House in its discussion, but I am willing to follow the general judgment of the House in regard to its disposition. My own desire would be to have the previous question ordered at this time, and then I shall be willing to give half of my hour to gentlemen who desire to discuss the bill, and I shall want the remainder of the time to explain any objections that may be made to it, if there be any objections urged.

Mr. ELIOT. Before the previous question is called I desire to send to the Clerk's desk an amendment, upon which I shall ask the action of the House. It is an amendment of which I notified my colleague when the bill was under discussion some time ago. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section third, commencing on the ninth line, strike out the words, "The President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to order the arrest and detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States," and to insert in lieu thereof the following words, "Such delay and refusal shall be regarded as an offense to the United States incompatible with the continuance of friendly relations with such foreign Government."

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection to that amendment being submitted to the House. I believe it was the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that it had better be submitted to a vote. I withdraw the motion to recommit, and allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I offer the amendment.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a substitute in order that it may be submitted to a vote of the House.

Mr. BANKS. I will hear it read.

The substitute proposed by Mr. JENCKES was as follows:

That the right of expatriation, and also the right of naturalization under the conditions imposed by law be, and they hereby are, declared to be and to have been a part of the public law recognized by the United States, and the executive department of the Government shall insist upon the recognition of these rights by the Governments of all other nations; and if such rights shall in any case or in any manner be contravened by the Government of any foreign State, contrary to the intent and purposes of this act, it shall be the duty of the Executive to give information of the same to Congress without delay, in order that means may be taken with effect for the protection of any citizens of the United States in any rights which may have been interfered with or denied by such foreign Governments.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any citizen of the United States may lose his national character: First. By becoming naturalized in any foreign country. Second. By undertaking, without the permission of this Government, the performance of public duties under a foreign Government. Third. By making his domicile in any foreign country without intent to return. But no residence for the purpose of commerce shall be considered as made without intent to return.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That citizens of the United States in every part of the world, while engaged upon lawful business, shall be entitled to and shall receive such protection as this Government has the power to afford to their persons and property, and the executive department of the Government shall see that such protection is given, and that the rights of American citizens shall be recognized in every foreign State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any citizen of the United States who shall have lost or renounced his citizenship in either of the modes hereinbefore set forth, may again become entitled to the same by resuming his permanent residence in any State or Territory thereof, and by making declaration of his intent to resume his citizenship in the clerk's office of any court of the United States.

Mr. BANKS. I do not yield for any amendment of that kind.

Mr. JENCKES. I hope the gentleman will give us further time for discussion, and that the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to move an amendment to that portion of the bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] has moved to strike out, and I ask the gentleman to yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. BANKS. I am willing to have the amendment voted on by the House.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend section three by inserting after the word "States" the words "except ambassadors and other public ministers and their domestics and domestic servants."

Mr. BANKS. I do not object to that amendment, though I do not regard it as at all necessary. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the privileges of foreign ministers do not depend upon the action of Congress, which cannot confer and cannot take away any such right. But inasmuch as it is explanatory I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PAINE. My object is to make it perfectly clear that we do not intend to authorize the President to attempt to violate the law of nations.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BANKS. I will hear it.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I desire to move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted That whenever any citizen of the United States, either native born or adopted, by a declaration in writing, made and executed in a district court of the United States within the State where he shall have held his last legal residence, done in open court, to be by said court entered of record in said court, declare that he relinquishes the character of a citizen of the United States, and shall thereupon depart out of the United States, such person shall, from and after the time of his said departure, be considered as having exercised his right of expatriation under this act, and shall thereafter be considered as no citizen of the United States, and as absolved from all allegiance thereto, and as having voluntarily relinquished all right and benefit of protection therefrom.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That any person, either as a native or adopted citizen of the United States, making such declaration, and departing out of the United States in accordance therewith, and being thus by this act deprived of all protection from and absolved from allegiance to the United States, shall not thereafter again become a citizen of the United States in any other manner than under and by virtue of the provisions of the naturalization laws then existing.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that amendment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN TRUMP] must see that it defeats the very purpose of legislating upon this bill. It is in effect a declaration that without the consent of the Government no citizen of the United States can cease to be such citizen. That defeats our claim upon foreign Governments in behalf of the naturalized citizens of this country.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. It is my misfortune to differ with the gentleman on that point.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BANKS. I will hear it read.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to offer the following as a substitute for this bill:

That the right of expatriation, like the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, is a natural and unalienable right.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when in the bona fide exercise of the rights of expatriation and naturalization citizens or subjects of any foreign State have heretofore become, or shall hereafter become, citizens of the United States, such naturalized citizens are citizens of the United States to all intents and purposes whatsoever, and as such are of right entitled to receive from this Government, and shall receive, the same protection of life, liberty, and property, that is awarded to native-born citizens of the United States in like situation and circumstances.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the United States will, at all hazards, extend full and complete protection to its native born and naturalized citizens, and will exercise the same jealous care and put forth the same measure of energy in the protection of the rights of its naturalized as of its native born citizens.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That to the end that the rights of American citizens in foreign countries may cease to be questioned, and that the peace of nations may be preserved, it is hereby declared to be the duty of the Executive of this Government to insist energetically and without delay upon the recognition of the foregoing rights by other Governments, and particularly to interpose with like promptitude and energy, upon the basis of the principles declared in this act, in the behalf of all American citizens whose rights may be infringed by or under the authority of any foreign State, and to lay before Congress as early as practicable, and from time to time, the results of such interposition, together with the facts involved in the cases which may now exist or hereafter arise of alleged violation of the principles of this act by or under the authority of any foreign State.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for that amendment to be offered.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. BANKS. Very well.

Mr. BAKER. I would prefer to have this in the form of a joint resolution.

Mr. BANKS. That is a mere declaration. It does not reach the purpose which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has in view. We want something more than that. With great respect for the opinions of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] I cannot yield to allow that amendment to be moved.

Mr. BAKER. Then I ask the gentleman whether he will yield that I may offer an amendment to strike out that part of the preamble which asserts in substance that the descendants of all immigrants into the United States since the formation of the Government are claimed by foreign countries as subjects? which I understand not to be a fact.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, it is not so asserted.

Mr. BAKER. Then I ask the gentleman to yield that I may offer another amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE,] who wishes to propose an amendment, and then I shall ask the judgment of the House upon this question.

Mr. PILE. I propose to amend the third section by inserting after the words "empowered to" the words "suspend in part or wholly commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available;" so as to make the clause read:

Or if any citizen shall have been arrested and detained, whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to suspend in part or wholly commercial relations with the said Government, or, in case no other remedy is available, to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, &c.

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection to having a vote on that amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before calling the previous question, I will ask the adoption of an amendment to the phraseology, which was proposed some time ago by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] now absent. It is to strike out at the end of the first section the words "and therefore null and void."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the verbal amendment stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKS. I now call the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the reading of the bill and amendments.

The Clerk read the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. BANKS. I now renew the call for the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

On seconding the call for the previous question, there were—ayes 58, noes 20; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. BANKS and JENCKES.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 25.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is now entitled to the floor to close the debate.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in addition to what I have already said on this subject, and I will not trespass long upon the attention of the House.

In regard to the remark of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] who wished to amend the preamble by striking out that part which refers to the claim of European nations, I have only to say that it is referred to as a claim. Whether the claim be well founded or not it is certainly a claim made by those Governments, and a claim which we deny. We know perfectly well that it is not true.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman allow me to read a few lines of the preamble?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER. The language of the preamble is:

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, for the protection of which the Government of the United States was established; and whereas, in the recognition of this principle, this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations and invested them with the rights of citizenship—

So far it is all right and all true, as I believe—and whereas it is claimed that all such American citizens with their descendants are subjects of foreign States, owing allegiance to the Governments thereof.

The language "all such American citizens" extends the statement back to the foundation of the Government.

Mr. BANKS. The word "all" has been stricken out.

Mr. BAKER. When was that done?

Mr. BANKS. When the bill was reported.

Mr. BAKER. Well, I was speaking of the bill as I find it on the file.

Mr. BANKS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say in regard to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. ELLIOT,] which might as well be a motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Before reading that amendment, however, I have one suggestion to make in regard to the general subject.

This bill presents a matter of legislation different in character from that which ordinarily comes before us. It is legislation for the purpose of affecting the action of other Governments. Ordinarily legislation is for the purpose of affecting our own Government. Here we propose to affect the action of foreign Governments, of European Governments, and that gives it a distinctive character as a legislative act. It stands, therefore, upon different principles, and involves different considerations.

If members of the House do not care by its action to affect the course and conduct of other Governments, I have nothing to say; that it is for them to judge. If gentlemen who represent constituents composed in great part of naturalized citizens are indifferent to the action and the claims of other Governments, and to the rights and claims of our own Government, I have nothing to say. If my colleague is willing that citizens of the United States shall be arrested in foreign countries for acts done and words spoken here; if he is willing that a member of this House, as one of its members—a native-born citizen of Massachusetts was once so arrested by a foreign Government for no crime committed against that Government—then his amendment is well adapted to effect his object. It presents a case past argument. If such legislation answers the purpose of the House, we have nothing to say. It is not an affair of ours. The Committee on Foreign Affairs reports this bill as the measure best calculated in the judgment of its members to secure from other Governments the recognition of the rights we claim on behalf of naturalized as well as native-born American citizens.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me ask gentlemen how it is expected we can influence foreign Governments upon this subject if we adopt no measures to affect that action? We can have no law they are bound to consider. For seventy-nine years the American Government has constantly and persistently proposed to foreign Governments its consideration, but they have politely, and in their view properly, declined to meet our wishes on this subject. They say they are quite willing to concede whatever rights Americans may claim under their own laws; but when we come to matters affecting their affairs they claim the same right that we exercise; that is to say, they treat it as a question of domestic legislation, and decline to consider the claims of our Government made in behalf of its naturalized citizens. We have practiced the expedients now recorded by my colleague for nearly three quarters of a century. We have remonstrated, we have declared that it must affect disadvantageously our friendly relations; we have even gone so far as to make war, but all to no purpose. We have found no method to compel them to give that attention to the subject which is necessary for its final and just settlement. What we now propose is a method of accomplishing that object. It compels foreign Governments, at least, to consider and decide upon for themselves and for us; and we entertain no doubt whatever, when such attention is given to this subject, that it will be settled finally and with justice to all parties. We cannot doubt this. But so long as we allow this matter to postpone and evade its decision, so long will it be delayed, and so long will our citizens be exposed to injury and wrong.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if the remedy he proposes is to authorize the President of the United States to arrest travelers? If that be so, then is it not the same as the remedy practiced by King Theodorus, of Abyssinia, with perfect success, so far as we have heard?

Mr. BANKS. I understand, so far as the Abyssinian king, Theodorus, is concerned, that he has not arrested travelers for the settlement of a case like this. What he does in regard to his Government he does in his own way. What we propose is for the action of the General Government in regard to our own affairs. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks this is of no more consequence to us than the conduct of King Theodorus in the administration of the affairs of his kingdom, we cannot expect to convince him of the necessity of the action we propose.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I used it only by way of illustration. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he proposes to accomplish this result in any other way except by authorizing the President of the United States to arrest travelers?

Mr. BANKS. I propose to make a declaration of the rights of our Government, and to compel foreign Governments to consider them.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. You propose to do it by the arrest of travelers.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; I do not propose to arrest any travelers. The word is not used in the bill. I do not propose that anybody shall be arrested. I propose the United States Government shall, in the exercise of powers conferred upon it by Congress, be able to compel foreign Governments to take action on this subject, with a view to the settlement of this question between us and them; and, sir, it is our belief that if the power recommended in this bill be conferred upon the Government, there will be no occasion for the arrest of anybody.

Twenty-five years ago Mr. Webster, in one of the ablest of his dispatches—a dispatch which I believe is accounted by his friends as doing the greatest honor to his great intellect—presented in the clearest and strongest manner the necessity of preserving the peace of the Government by a final arrangement of this question between the United States and England. The English Government paid no regard to it whatever. They never so far considered it as to answer it. It was referred by Lord Ashburton to his Government almost without comment, and I think it never obtained any consideration whatever from that Government. The reason was that they claim this to be a domestic question affecting their own local Government with which we have nothing to do. So long as we allow that claim, so long they will exercise the power of which our people complain.

Now, I ask the attention of the House to the status of this question as it affects England, and I do not speak of England as an exception to the Governments of other foreign countries. In England a change of ministry is probable. There are domestic difficulties of a very serious nature, which threaten not only the success of the present administration, but, perhaps, the stability of the Government itself. England has traditions upon this question which she has maintained for six hundred years. No administration and no minister has ever surrendered or proposed to surrender them. I ask any member of this House if he expects that the Government of the United States can call upon the administration of the English Government at this time to voluntarily abandon English traditions and laws and recognize the principles of the American Government upon the subject of citizenship and allegiance unless the American Government shall make such a demand for action as to compel consideration, if not acquiescence in our demands. In the absence of such action on our part any English administration that should, without necessity, concede that which we regard as right, would be overturned in an hour because it would be construed by its opponents as an unnecessary abandonment of everything that England has claimed through all her administrations in regard to her right to control her own municipal legislation in the first instance, and secondly in regard to her jurisdiction over subjects who have left her dominions without her consent.

If we expect any Government to act upon this question in such a manner as to satisfy our demands we are bound in honor and interest to present it in such manner as to satisfy all classes of people and all parties that it cannot be disregarded. I have said already that if it is considered we shall have a satisfactory judgment. The claim we present is of such a character that it cannot be denied by any Government that expects to maintain friendly relations with us. But so long as we leave them to decide it for themselves alone, so long must we expect a settlement of the question to be delayed. Every foreign Government has a right to ask of us not only a persistent but a positive claim for action on their part in order to justify them in yielding to the claim that we make. We cannot expect them to abandon their own and recognize our principles unless we present them in such manner as to command action. Now, in what way can it be so presented? The Committee on Foreign Affairs believes it can best be done by adopting the principle of reprisal, which is embodied in the third section of the bill before us, and it has been reported for this purpose. The amendment of my colleague [Mr. ELIOT] presents a different method. His proposition is that if citizens of the United States, native or foreign born, shall continue to be arrested by foreign Governments, it shall be "regarded as an offense to the United States incompatible with the continuance of friendly relations." Well now, sir, I do not want any share in such legislation as that.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs one question, with his permission.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to know if this great question has been adjusted between our Government and Prussia or the North Germanic Confederation in a manner satisfactory to our people?

Mr. BANKS. I will speak of the Prussian treaty in a moment.

Mr. ELIOT. I should like to have my colleague state whether he represents, in what he says as to this amendment of mine, the judgment, as he understands it, of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BANKS. I do understand it to be their unanimous judgment.

Mr. ELIOT. I beg leave to say that I differ with my colleague as to that.

Mr. BANKS. We have had many deliberations upon this question. I understand that every proposition that has been presented by the chairman of the committee to the House has had the unanimous consent of that committee, and I take it upon myself to say, with pleasure, that I have refrained in every instance from any attempt to impress upon the committee views of my own, and have presented to them no proposition upon this subject which had not the unanimous approval of the committee. That is my reply to the question of my colleague.

I have stated before that I have never sought even to impress my own views upon the committee, much less to control that committee upon any subject; and whenever I have made a report from that committee my understanding is that it has been with the unanimous consent of its members.

Now, let my colleague [Mr. ELIOT] look at his proposition for a moment. "Such delay and refusal"—that is, delay or refusal to deliver up the citizens of the United States—"shall be regarded as an offense to the United States, incompatible with the continuance of friendly relations." Now, I pass the word "offense" as amounting to nothing. But I would call the attention of my colleague to the result: "it will be incompatible with the continuance of friendly relations."

Now, I undertake to say that there are twenty millions of our people whose rights of travel and sojourn in other States are injuriously affected by the claim of inalienable set up by foreign Governments with regard to their native-born subjects. Wherever there are questions pending between us and foreign Governments, like this now pending between us and Great Britain, the claim is of such a character that it covers a large part, if not the whole, of our population.

I do not know but that, in the judgment of the House, I may have stated the point too strongly. But if there be ten million or five million, or one million or one thousand persons thus affected—if there be one man thus deprived of the rights of travel and sojourn in other countries which are enjoyed by subjects of other Governments in this country, it cannot be expected of us that we are to submit to it indefinitely; and yet these negotiations and these injuries have continued nearly eighty years without an approach to any settlement whatever.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. BANKS. For how long a time?

Mr. ELIOT. Well, say ten minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I would inquire of the Chair how much time I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour commenced at twenty-eight minutes past two, and he has now forty-four minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. BANKS. I will yield five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. ELIOT. I will try and use that liberal allowance of time as well as I may. In the first place, it is charged by the gentleman who has reported this bill [Mr. BANKS] that the amendment which I have offered to-day, and which I indicated some time ago, is one which substantially repeals the enacting clause of this bill. Now, I have a better opinion of the bill reported by the gentleman from the Committee on Foreign Affairs than he himself seems to have. And, in my judgment, the amendment which I have offered will make his bill a sensible and an effective one, instead of a bill which, if it shall have any effect at all, will probably involve us in a war before the proper time shall have arrived.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is not the only gentleman here who feels desirous that all proper legislation shall be had to protect the rights of citizens of the United States traveling abroad. But I differ from him in supposing that the best way to do that is to give the President of the United States the arbitrary power to himself select such man or men within the United States as he may choose and to incarcerate them in case information shall come here of the arrest of one of our citizens abroad, and in case that citizen is not released from arrest within a certain time. I am not in favor of giving the President power to arrest any man, whoever he may be, whether that man be a minister from abroad, whether he be here representing some foreign Government in its diplomatic relations, or whether he be a traveler here within the confines of our country; whether he be here officially or unofficially. In my judgment the end which the gentleman seeks to gain will not be attained in the best manner by permitting the President to order such arrest ex mero motu upon a case found by him.

Now, sir, the preamble of this bill recites an important principle in legislative form; all that it is desirable to have embodied in the law. The first section of the bill provides—

That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government, and therefore null and void.

I hold it important that a declaration of that kind should be made, and made in the form of law.

The second section proposes to declare—

That all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign States shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances.

That is a legislative declaration never heretofore made, a declaration of vital importance, which I for one should be glad to see incorporated into the laws of the country. Then, in the third section, it is provided—

That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government, in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign; or if any citizen shall have been arrested and detained whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the President shall, without delay, give information to Congress of any such proceedings under this act.

Now, sir, this tit-for-tat legislation is not what I deem wise or just. I hold it to be rather of the kind that might have been deemed advisable in the days of Moses, when "an eye for an eye" was the law. I hold that if this Government shall declare by law that such an act as is here described will be deemed to be an offense against the United States incompatible with the continuance of friendly relations with the Government offending, it will be a pretty serious declaration upon the part of Congress, and will result in such immediate action as will remove all cause of difference in the case named. The suspension of friendly relations will call for instant examination of the case, that friendly relations may be restored. My colleague does not mean to say that if the United States Government should adopt in the form of law such a declaration as I propose in my amendment it would be brutum fulmen. He has too high a regard for the character of his Government, its dignity, its strength, the influence which it has upon the other Powers of the earth, to take any such position.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT. I ask my colleague to give me a few moments more.

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ELIOT. Nor will my colleague state, I think, that any one who here in his place proposes such an amendment thereby justly exposes himself to the intimation, which seemed to be conveyed by the gentleman, of not desiring as earnestly, as truthfully, as conscientiously as he himself that the rights of the citizens of this nation shall in every country upon the face of the globe be equally protected, whether those citizens be native-born or naturalized. My colleague and I both seek (I suppose him to be seeking the same end that I do) the protection, the security of the citizen of the United States abroad. He thinks it will be better gained by giving to the President authority, according to his own arbitrary will, to select from the strangers among us who may be citizens or subjects of the Government offending such a one as he may choose and order his imprisonment. I believe that the end desired will be more effectually and properly gained by saying to that Government, "Until this matter is examined and this wrong redressed friendly relations with you shall be suspended." By taking that position the end would, in my judgment, be better gained; and it is because I thus believe that I ask the action of the House upon my amendment, which is offered for the purpose of strengthening the bill, not weakening it.

Mr. BANKS. Of course I do not wish to impute any want of interest in this subject to my colleague or to any other member of this House. As I have said, if these were new questions we might be satisfied with the proposition embraced in his amendment; but, sir, it is an affair of eighty years, and is still unsettled. We have made these representations frequently, we have made them continually for this whole period of three quarters of a century, and we have never yet succeeded in reaching any result on this subject, and we can never reach any satisfactory result until we make it necessary for other Governments to act upon it. So long as we leave it to the option of foreign administrations to act on this question or not, so long will they disregard our claims. You cannot expect any English administration or any administration of any Government to concede them against the traditions of their own Government for five or six hundred years unless we shall force upon them the necessity for such action.

Mr. DAWES. I am anxious to vote for this bill, to vote for the most efficient measure to carry out the ends which my colleague says on due consideration in committee they have endeavored to obtain by legislation. To that end I desire to ask my colleague if he understands on the enactment of this bill into law the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus will be suspended as to all persons who may be arrested by the President under the third section?

Mr. BANKS. It is immaterial whether it is suspended or not.

Mr. DAWES. One word more. If it is not suspended I should like to ask my colleague what will be the use of this enactment? If, upon its enactment, the President should see fit to arrest any person in this country, and is unable to say it is for any offense committed by that person within the jurisdiction of this country, how long could he detain him upon the writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. BANKS. I make this answer to that question, that he will detain him just so long as the Congress of the United States chooses to maintain this law. Just so long as American citizens are arrested in other countries, so long will such persons be detained by the President of the United States, if any are even arrested.

Mr. DAWES. I want to understand it. Does my colleague say that anybody can be arrested by the President of the United States by virtue of this law without regard to any court which has the right to issue a writ of habeas corpus, unless it is for an offense committed by that individual and committed within the jurisdiction of our country?

Mr. BANKS. I say, Mr. Speaker, unhesitatingly, that the position the gentleman takes does not touch this question at all. The laws do not allow the arrest of any citizen except for some offense against the laws, and whenever he is arrested the writ of habeas corpus applies to him.

Mr. DAWES. Offense committed by him?

Mr. BANKS. Offense committed by him.

Mr. DAWES. I want to know, Mr. Speaker, how a traveler in this country, for no offense committed by him, can be detained simply because the sovereign in another jurisdiction has committed some offense against the law?

Mr. BANKS. He has committed no offense; whatever individual is arrested under this statute will not be arrested because of any offense committed by him. It is the assertion of the sovereign power of this Government to enforce the rights of its citizens against other Governments. It is in the nature of a compulsory regulation, and exercise of its sovereign power to secure the rights of its own citizens at the hands of other Governments?

Mr. DAWES. Then you do mean that the writ of habeas corpus, as touching that individual, would be suspended.

Mr. BANKS. Not at all. I mean simply to say that if the President shall ever arrest any subject of a foreign Government under this law, and any court should issue a writ of habeas corpus, and the individual should be brought before the court, that court would decide that he could be detained under this law of Congress, and that until the President should release him he would be held as a hostage for the protection and security of the rights of American citizens.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire whether the Constitution does not guaranty to every individual here that he shall not be arrested except for some offense of his own, and upon a warrant indicating what the offense is?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly; but that applies to citizens. If my colleague means to say that the Government of the United States is deprived of all power to enforce against other Governments the rights of its citizens, then I might concede his argument. But it is against that that we protest. We protest against this doctrine that the Government of the United States has no power to compel other Governments to consider the rights of our citizens when they are within their limits.

Mr. DAWES. If my colleague means to intimate that I hold that doctrine because in my opinion every individual within our jurisdiction in time of peace has the same rights in our courts whether he be a citizen or a foreigner, he is mistaken entirely. Does the gentleman mean to say that when a man is brought up upon habeas corpus in time of peace in one of our courts the court stops to inquire whether he is a citizen of the United States or not?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. DAWES. Then, sir, if citizens of the United States and foreigners in time of peace stand upon the same level, I inquire again of my colleague by what authority under the Constitution of the United States can you arrest any citizen of the United States or foreigner standing upon the same level with citizens of the United States, unless you charge against him some offense committed by him individually against the laws of the United States?

Mr. BANKS. My colleague takes too narrow a view of this question. The habeas corpus is a writ which brings any person arrested before a court to know by what authority he is held. The person holding this man in duress will show the authority, an act of Congress intended to protect its own citizens abroad, intended to enforce upon other Governments a regard for the rights of our citizens.

Mr. DAWES. Will it not be a clear answer for the man to say that he has committed no offense against that law? Will it not be enough for him to say, "You do not even allege that I have infringed that law?"

Mr. BANKS. It will not be enough. It does not come within the pale of the criminal law in any way whatever.

Mr. PAINE. I would be glad to ask one of the gentlemen from Massachusetts to explain the predicament in which I find myself. The gentleman from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat [Mr. DAWES] informs us that the Constitution provides that no man shall be arrested except for some crime which he has himself committed. Now, I would be glad if he would point out to us the provision of the Constitution to which he refers.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to yield for that purpose. There is no provision of the Constitution which forbids us to exercise the power in question.

Mr. DAWES. Let me ask my friend from Wisconsin if he holds the doctrine that a man can be arrested without any offense being charged against him?

Mr. PAINE. I have not said that I hold any doctrine. I merely asked the gentleman to show us the clause of the Constitution, or what he declares is a part of it.

Mr. DAWES. It is in every letter and word of the Constitution—the spirit and life of it—that every man shall be safe in his person and in his property.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me I will read a clause of the Constitution of four lines from article thirteen:

"Neither slavery or involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

[Laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. I do not see the application of that clause to this question. This, as I said before, is not an ordinary subject of legislation, and it is to the difference in its character that we must attribute the various views which are entertained by gentlemen.

Mr. JUDD. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to section five of the amendments to the Constitution? It is in these words:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime except on a presentment or indictment."

Mr. BANKS. We do not charge anybody with any crime. It is useless to read that. If the gentleman does not see the application we cannot convince him. We do not charge that any man who may be arrested under this act is guilty of any crime. He is to be arrested in the exercise of the sovereign power of this Government for the protection of its own citizens, and with a view of compelling his own Government to take action upon this question. If the gentleman has so tender a conscience in regard to the rights of foreign citizens in this country, what does he say of the American citizens—three or four hundred of them—who are now in prison in Great Britain for no offense whatever committed against the laws of that country?

Mr. JUDD. I wish the honorable gentleman would allow me to read this entire section.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot well yield for that, because my time is limited. I say to the gentleman from Illinois—and if he cannot discover it for himself, it is impossible for me to convince him—that that relates solely to crimes and criminals in this country with which this bill has nothing to do whatever.

Mr. JUDD. I say to my honorable friend that if he will allow me to read the section through instead of cutting me off—

Mr. BANKS. I know what it is.

Mr. JUDD. If you will allow me to read it.

Mr. BANKS. Well, read it.

Mr. JUDD. I will read it:

"No person"—

This is "person," not "citizen"—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person"—

This is "person" again, not "citizen"—

"nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law;"—

This all relates to "person," not "citizen"—

"nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] if it has not been determined by the adjudication of the courts of this country that the term "by due process of law" means not by a legislative enactment, but by a proceeding in a court of justice?

Mr. BANKS. The clause of the Constitution to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] has referred relates altogether to crimes and the arrest of criminals. I do not present this as a criminal matter. It is not alleged that the subject who may be arrested is to be regarded as a criminal. It is a question of international law, an international proceeding. The man is to be held as a hostage for the rights of American citizens who are deprived of them in the country to which the subject belongs. It is not probable that any arrest will be made. All that is proposed is that the President shall have the power; that when the power of arrest is exercised in other States, he shall be authorized to that extent, at least, to make reprisals. We want the power to compel foreign States to settle this question at issue between us.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. MULLINS. Does not the article of the Constitution just read authorize arrests for public necessity? And is this not a matter of public necessity?

Mr. BANKS. It may, undoubtedly, be so considered. Now, there are controversies constantly arising between nations; there are certain recognized powers which each nation has a right to exercise within its own jurisdiction, and which stop short of war. I referred to them in detail on another occasion when this subject was before the House. One is the suspension of commercial intercourse; another is the right to enforce an embargo. And there are various acts of that character which the Government has the right to exercise for the protection of its own rights which are not acts of war and which do not necessarily lead to war. This right of refusal and arrest is one which comes within that sovereign power accorded to each independent State by the recognized principles of international law for its own defense and the protection of its citizens.

Every Government has the right for its own peace and security to arrest the citizens of a foreign Power, within its own jurisdiction, in time of peace or war; to put an embargo upon its vessels, to prohibit commercial intercourse between its own citizens and those of other countries. It may extend its power as far as it pleases without limiting it to the exercise of the power of arresting a single person for the same object. This is not to punish any person for a criminal offense; it is not for his injury, but to compel his Government to consider the claim we make. That is the object we have in view.

Mr. JUDD. Will the honorable gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield now, for my time has nearly expired.

Mr. JUDD. Will the gentleman yield to me for two minutes?

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] has already occupied more time upon this question than any other member of this House, and he certainly should be content without taking any portion of my time, inasmuch as I have but a few minutes left, and have been subject to constant interruptions from all sides of the House, to which I have cheerfully yielded.

My colleague [Mr. DAVES] calls my attention to article four of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which I will read. It is as follows:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

Now, my colleague knows perfectly well that that provides that an arrest, seizure, or search shall not be made without the authority of the Government. What we propose is to give that authority to the Government. This article does not apply to anything beyond that, and does not in any respect controvert the principle I advocate, or the action recommended by the committee.

Mr. BENTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. For what purpose?

Mr. BENTON. Is it contemplated under this bill that there may be a legal investigation of the case of the person arrested?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly there will be an investigation of the question whether there is authority to hold him or not. There must be investigations; let me say the more the better. Publicity is what we want. It will be a subject of constant investigation, and I ask the attention of my colleague [Mr. DAVES] to the point, whether a foreign Government may seize and imprison, without trial, citizens of the United States guilty of no offense, as subjects of a foreign Government, while we have no power to do anything for their relief, or for the correction of unjust principles of Government by which such arrests are justified.

Mr. DAVES. Will there also be an investigation of the guilt or innocence of the man arrested?

Mr. BANKS. We have nothing to do with that. It is with his Government that we are interested. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the House must see that there is no connection between the rights of persons under the criminal law or the provisions of the Constitution relating to criminal law and the powers of a Government in a case of this kind. The question is broader, more extended than anything relating to the rights of persons under the Constitution, whether citizens or aliens. It is the question whether the Government of the United States has power to take any action whatever to compel the Governments of other countries to consider the rights of our citizens and to bring the matter to negotiation and settlement. That is all. We stand for that and nothing more.

I said the other day that reprisal is not necessarily a barbarous proceeding. I say now that it is not a barbarous proceeding. It may be an act of the highest civilization. And let me call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the Government of the United States has never attained the recognition of its rights from other Governments, with a few exceptions, except by the adoption of this principle of action. When General Jackson entered upon the administration of the Government he found unsettled controversies with nearly all the States of Europe; controversies dating back, some of them, to the beginning of our Government. Up to that time there had been found no means of compelling the attention of foreign Governments to such matters. We had controverted questions pending with France, with England, with Turkey, with Italy, with Spain, with Portugal, and with some other States. They disregarded every claim that we made upon them and gave us nothing in satisfaction and nothing in prospect but barren negotiation. We said, as my colleague [Mr. ELIOT] recommends us to say now, "If you do not attend to our complaints it will be difficult for us to maintain friendly relations with you." But such a course was not enough for General Jackson; nor was it enough for the Government of the United States. Selecting the strongest of those Governments, the President brought our controversies with that Government to an issue, and in that action he was unanimously sustained by this House. How did he do it? He said to the Government of France, "Unless you recognize your obligations to the Government of the United States we will seize your vessels or other property, and take such other measures as shall be necessary to secure the rights of the people of this country." France then yielded the point in controversy.

Mr. DAVES. Will my colleague allow me to present right here a single suggestion?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVES. My colleague has said that he bases this bill upon the ground that it is the obligation of this Government to protect its citizens in foreign countries when imprisoned there while guilty of no offense against the laws of those countries; and he proposes to vindicate the rights of our own citizens by visiting similar unjust imprisonment upon innocent foreigners traveling in our own country. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is justifiable to resort to war, as I agree with my colleague it is, to defend the rights of our citizens in foreign countries guilty of no offense against the laws of those countries, it is equally a justification for a resort to war on the part of a foreign Government if we, in this country, inflict upon a foreigner guilty of no crime the same unjust imprisonment of which we complain when inflicted upon our own citizens abroad. We propose to go to war with a foreign country for imprisoning our citizens guilty of no offense; and yet we propose to write it down on our statute-book that we shall do the same thing toward an innocent foreigner in our own country.

Mr. BANKS. My colleague begs the question. We propose nothing with regard to a citizen of any other country. We have no controversy with such persons. We propose action with regard to foreign Governments. Our difficulty is with the foreign Government, not with its subjects. If any foreign Government, in the event of an arrest under this bill, should undertake to vindicate the rights of its citizens its first step will be to settle this question between us and them, and, failing in that, to make war upon us. If there is to be war upon this question, or any other, I hope it may always be initiated by other Governments. The proper position of this Government is a defensive position.

My colleague speaks of his willingness to go to war. Sir, he does not mean war. My other colleague does not mean war. If they consent to the action proposed against an individual subject of another Government, they are not bold enough to assert the rights of our people against the Government itself; they do not mean this country shall be involved in war. Sir, I do not wish to involve this country in war. The Committee on Foreign Affairs do not want war. What we want is peace. And the measure we recommend is to maintain peace. What we ask is that this question shall not drag along until restless and excited persons shall involve us in war by committing this or other Governments to that action from which they cannot recede and which leads to war.

Mr. HARDING. Your bill is partial war.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; not quite that. But it is a measure looking to the assertion of the sovereign power of the nation, which, if disregarded by other nations, might in the end lead to war.

I will say, sir, that this measure is not an act of war according to the interpretation of international law; but if a foreign Government should compel us to go to war on this question then we must abandon our independence. Our action should be such as to secure our rights or to compel other nations to make war upon us. The responsibility of war should be put upon them, and in the defense as we claim in behalf of naturalized or native-born citizens we can very well afford to enter upon our defense if it shall become necessary.

This principle brings the question to a settlement, whatever may be the result. General Jackson's action of this character brought the Government of France to an immediate settlement. He brought to a settlement in the same way our difficulties with other Governments. His principle was that he would ask nothing that was not right and would submit to nothing that was wrong. He did not wait until other Governments were ready to consider our rights. He compelled action upon subjects of controversy that had existed, many of them, from the earliest period of the Government. His policy was that which we present in this bill, that of reprisals. He was willing to accept anything that looked like justice in the way of settlements, but he would not submit to no action at all. We adopt his policy in this great controversy in regard to the rights of American citizens in foreign States, and we are confident of its success as we are of its justice. General Jackson, by the same policy which we recommend now to favorable consideration of the House, obtained the payment of the French indemnity for spoiliations upon American commerce; the payment of the Danish indemnity; the Neapolitan indemnity; the Spanish indemnity; the Portuguese indemnity for similar wrongs sustained by American citizens. Under the influence of such measures and such success he opened for the first time the direct trade with the British West Indies, negotiated treaties with Turkey, opened the Black sea to American commerce, established liberal commercial relations with the Government of Morocco and other States, to which in an earlier period of our history we had paid an annual tribute for the maintenance of peace, and what is more interesting and satisfactory is that he established those friendly relations never before attained between the United States and Russia which have been of so great advantage to both countries. This success was the result of the principle he proclaimed and the policy he adopted. He demanded nothing that was not right. He submitted to nothing that was wrong, and he allowed no Governments to defer without reason the consideration of the claims he urged. By this policy he settled controversies amicably and justly that had been outstanding for half a century. But for this settlement they would still remain to embroil the nations in war, not with a single State only, but possibly with the whole of Europe. His decisive action was a policy of peace, and the same principle we recommend now for the same object. His administration was an era in the history of the country, not a single outstanding controversy was left between the United States and the Governments of Europe. It was not war. It did not lead to war. On the contrary, sir, it was peace. It was civilization. It was defending the honor of the United States, and securing to our citizens their rights.

My colleague has undertaken to pin us down to the theory that this is a mere matter of criminal law. We discard this idea, exercising our sovereign power, which, though it may lead to war, puts the responsibility of war on others, not on us, and which in itself is intended only as the vindication of the honor of the country and the rights of its citizens.

There is another view of this subject to which I wish to allude.

Mr. BENTON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BANKS. If I am to be interrupted so much I must ask that my time shall be extended.

The SPEAKER. How much?

Mr. BANKS. Say ten minutes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that it be extended fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BENTON. I would ask whether the bill provides for a legal investigation into the case of each individual who is arrested?

Mr. BANKS. The bill has nothing to do with investigation of anybody's offenses or case. The law asserted is that of reprisals, and persons who are arrested will be held as hostages.

Mr. BENTON. Suppose an innocent person is arrested who is guilty of no crime?

Mr. BANKS. It has nothing to do with the crimes of any person whatever. We oppose the claim of foreign Governments to hold naturalized citizens of the United States as their own. So long as they refuse to consider our claim we have the right to exercise the same power on their citizens. In this way similar questions with foreign Governments were settled.

Let me state, because it is of interest, that this question of citizenship and inalienable allegiance was thought at that time to have been settled. We had a war upon it, and England was thought to have abandoned her claim. There was not sufficient emigration then to excite inquiry. It was at that time believed to have been settled; but now we find the same doctrine is again asserted. If this question had arisen in Jackson's administration as it is now, he would never have allowed it to remain unsettled for a single hour, and his remedy would have been that provided in this bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] asked me a question in regard to the Prussian treaty. That is an important subject. Sir, the Prussian treaty has transferred legislation upon the rights of American citizens from the United States and its Government to the Government of a foreign country. Prussia has granted in the treaty such rights as she chooses to acknowledge. The Government of the United States had no defined policy in regard to this matter which limited the minister of the United States in his negotiations with that Government. The result of it is that we have the Prussian treaty, which is a treaty which allows all the laws of Prussia to be in operation against any naturalized citizen of this country who returns to that country if an action of any kind can be made to lie against him. That is what it is.

Now, sir, the first bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon this subject would have prevented the negotiation of a treaty upon this basis. It would have defeated its ratification if it had been negotiated. It would have placed the question upon an American basis. The bill to which I refer conceded to other Governments the rights which they claim; but it secured the recognition of the rights which we claim. Any American minister who undertook to negotiate a treaty would have negotiated it in the light of the bill had it become a law. We would have had instead of the Prussian treaty an American treaty, and that American treaty would have been followed in the negotiations with other Governments in Europe just as now the Prussian treaty will be made the model for future negotiations. The Prussian treaty is now a treaty for the whole of Europe. We cannot accept less or demand more of other Governments than is secured by the recent negotiations. And I venture the prediction, however much I may be gratified with the liberality of the Prussian Government, that that treaty embodies within itself provisions which will require further negotiation and further action on the part of this Government. Sir, I want a statute in this country that shall be the basis for treaty stipulations, and that should be the object of our legislation. It should openly accord to other Governments what is necessary for the maintenance of their rights, and it should secure what is necessary for the maintenance of our own. It was such a project that we first reported to the House. It conceded nothing that was not right and it demanded nothing that was wrong, and it contained, as does the bill now before us, the means of enforcing itself.

My colleague [Mr. ELIOT] has called my attention to the excellent provisions of the preamble of the present bill. Sir, they are nothing. They are mere declarations questioned by nobody here, and without the slightest effect under any other Government. They are well enough; but, sir, they only recognize the principles of natural law. These principles are neither stronger nor weaker for being embraced in the preamble. We introduced it because gentlemen of the House thought it necessary to have some recognition of those principles. But it does not effect the change we desire in the policy of other Governments. You might as well describe the space which shall constitute a bushel or the length which shall make a yard, as to declare this principle. It is of no effect unless the Governments of other States choose to recognize it, and make it their own legislation, which they are not inclined to do.

So, sir, with the first section of the bill. It merely states that any opinion given by any agent or officer of this Government that the right of expatriation depends upon the consent of the Government is not American law, and is in contravention with the principles of the American Government. That is all.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman inform the House what declaration is made in any part of this bill as to what is the American law upon the subject of expatriation?

Mr. BANKS. It is a subject which, in our opinion, ought not to be legislated upon. Now, I want my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] to say to me whether he is willing that the right of speech, the right of petition, the right to assemble in public meeting, the right to bear arms, shall be made dependent upon the statutes of the Government? I want him to say to me whether my right, or his right, to hear, to see, to smell, to feel, or to walk is to be made dependent upon an act of the American Congress? No, sir; this comes within the scope and character of natural rights which no Government has the right to control and which no Government can confer. And wherever this subject is alluded to in the Constitution—a Constitution framed by wise men—it is in the declaration that Congress shall have no power whatever to legislate upon these matters.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one further question?

Mr. BANKS. What is it?

Mr. JENCKES. If there be no legislation upon the subject is not the common law respecting allegiance in force?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; never.

Mr. JENCKES. What has abrogated it?

Mr. BANKS. The Constitution of the United States; the Declaration of American Independence; the war of the Revolution; our war with Great Britain in 1812; our triumphs upon the sea and upon the land; all these have abrogated the English common law, except it be in the minds of such gentlemen as the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.] We have no treaty with Great Britain which forfeits the rights we claim, and we shall never make a treaty which shall forfeit the right of expatriation on the part of American citizens, or recognize the forfeiture on the part of British subjects, for it is a natural right.

My colleague [Mr. ELIOT] referred to the excellent provisions of the second section of this bill, as follows:

That all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign States shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances.

That is most excellent reading, but it is prohibited in France and in England. They do not recognize that doctrine there; they do not sing that song. And we may sing it as long as we please, and they will exercise their power in a different way, and set it to different music. Now, what we want is that the European Governments shall be induced to consent to the principles of the American Government.

Mr. ELIOT. If it is a declaration which is worth nothing then why assert it?

Mr. BANKS. Because it is the principle upon which we plant the third section of this bill; it is a right which we will enforce against all nations of the earth, and at all hazards. But its assertion is unimportant unless it be with intent to secure its recognition.

The second section states a principle which has rarely or never been denied in this country, but which has never been admitted by any foreign Government, and we establish upon that principle another equally important in its character, equally well founded, which has given the best results to our Government, and from the exercise of which we now enjoy the blessings of peace with all foreign nations. We plant upon this section this practical power of compelling the Governments of Europe to yield at least a consideration to the questions which we present. It is for that reason we present it.

I like this bill; it is all excellent music. But if you leave out the only clause which refers to action, and which compels people who do not like this music to listen to it, and bring us and them to a tolerable harmony upon this question, it will avail us nothing. Of course I have no right to judge of the intent and purpose of my colleague; but I will say to him that his constituent who may be arrested under the asserted power of other Governments will have reason to complain of his forbearance and delicacy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I return to the single point which I had in my mind when I commenced speaking. This is no question of criminal law, and hence it is no subject for criminal lawyers. It has nothing to do with the clauses of the Constitution relating to the arrest of persons for crime. We propose in this bill to assert the sovereignty of the Government of the United States. The bill embodies a principle of action which international law has conferred upon all Governments, the right of seeking means to enforce the recognition of the rights of its citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will allow me to say a word further as to the nature of this principle of reprisals. I have shown how the assertion of this principle operated during General Jackson's administration, settling our affairs all around the circle, and leaving us at the close of that great administration in perfect peace with all the world. I have shown, I think, how General Jackson would treat this question if his administration existed now. He would apply now the same power that he applied then, and with the same result.

Sir, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that such has been the principle of action recognized and exercised by this Government both abroad and at home from its very foundation. No matter how trivial the occasion, wherever there has been a necessity for the settlement of a question, and that settlement has been deferred, the Government of the United States has adopted this principle in its legislation to bring about a settlement. We propose to assert the principle now. It has never discredited the character of this Government; it has never led us into war. On the contrary, it has given us the highest honor as a Government, and it has enabled us to maintain peace. We find instances of the assertion of this principle from the very foundation of our Government. The first instance of the kind, I think, was in the case of the State of Rhode Island, so ably represented by my friend on the other side, [Mr. JENCKES,] whose great interest in this question has recalled the incident to my mind.

When our Government was inaugurated under the Constitution of the United States in 1789, Rhode Island was not inclined to participate in the advantages of the Union. She refused all proffers; she rejected all invitations. She thought herself independent and strong enough to stand outside the Union. In 1790, in pursuance of a resolution introduced in the Senate of the United States, a law was passed prohibiting all commercial intercourse between the United States and the State of Rhode Island after the 1st of July of that year. That act passed the Senate, I believe, in February or March, 1790. The prohibition of commercial intercourse was to go into effect on the 1st of July; and on the 1st of June General Washington in a special message congratulated the Congress of the United States upon the accession of Rhode Island to the Union as one of its sovereign States. But for that principle of compulsion there would have been no means of bringing to an issue the questions between the State of Rhode Island and the United States Government. It is the same principle that we have adopted in this bill.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman's remarks convey an entirely erroneous impression as to the reason why Rhode Island was last at the feast.

Mr. BANKS. I gave no reason for the action of Rhode Island.

Mr. JENCKES. When the law to which the gentleman has referred was passed the convention of Rhode Island was in session; and the reason why the final act of ratification was delayed was that the citizens of Rhode Island were strenuous for the protection and preservation of the personal rights of the people, and were not altogether satisfied with the guarantees provided by the Constitution as it then stood.

Mr. BANKS. I have no doubt that Rhode Island had excellent reasons for her conduct. The point to which I desired to call the attention of the House was the manner in which that controversy was cut short and the State of Rhode Island brought into the Union.

Mr. DAWES. As that is an interesting matter of history, I would like to inquire whether the United States in that case dealt with the citizens of Rhode Island or with the State?

Mr. BANKS. The State of Rhode Island was then practically within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. Did our Government propose to seize and hold citizens of Rhode Island whenever they came within the borders of the United States?

Mr. BANKS. The United States, because it had jurisdiction of that State, operated upon all the people of the State and their government. What it might have done I cannot say; what it did was enough to secure its object.

Mr. DAWES. Had we jurisdiction over the State before she was in the Union?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir; before she came in. By the Revolution the United States acquired the right to control, and did control in the manner I have recited. And if my colleague is not familiar with that portion of our history, let me tell him that if New York or Virginia or any other State or States controlling the heart of this country had undertaken to maintain their own separate independence or to acknowledge allegiance to Great Britain or any other foreign Government, the same jurisdiction would have been seized and exercised by the Government of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I understood my colleague to say—

Mr. BANKS. I do not want to go into any hair-splitting arguments on this question. I state the fact, that Rhode Island came into this Union because Congress passed a law prohibiting all commercial intercourse between the people of the United States and the people of that State, unless she came into the Union. That is what I stated.

Mr. DAWES. I only inquired what analogy there was between that case and this one. Then you proceeded against a government, here you proceed against the individual citizens.

Mr. BANKS. It is the analogy of right. It is the analogy of force, the analogy of necessity, the analogy of success; and when the Government of the United States shall assert the rights of its citizens and enforce them upon foreign Governments, we shall exercise the same power and enjoy the same success.

Mr. COBURN. I trust the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question in relation to the third section.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. COBURN. I ask him whether a person of foreign birth, who has merely declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, will not be liable to arrest under this third section?

Mr. BANKS. Not if we have a wise man for President, as I hope we always may have. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBURN. We may have a fool for a President, and I do not suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to discourage emigration.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly not.

Mr. COBURN. I propose to insert after the word "States," in the thirteenth line, these words, "and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States." A simple-minded man residing in a foreign Government, reading this law as it is proposed, would suppose that he would not be exempted from arrest, even if he had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and would believe that he would be liable to arrest for five years after his residence here, and until his naturalization had become complete. Now, it is not our purpose to arrest those who have declared their intentions to become citizens, nor to frighten foreigners from coming here, and so to exclude such a conclusion I offer this amendment, so that it may be perfectly understood that he who declares his intention to become a citizen shall not be subject to the annoyance of an arrest.

Mr. BANKS. I do not object to the gentleman's amendment being incorporated in the bill. The exercise of the power of the Government in the settlement of questions between individuals rests upon the same principle exactly. In contests between individuals for the possession of property, if left to themselves, there could be no settlement without violence. Therefore the Government steps in and seizes the property and brings the parties into court and adjudicates upon the controversy. The principle embodied in this bill is of the same character. It stands upon the principle which lies at the foundation of all Governments; for unless you have some power to settle controversies which arise between Governments or individuals all security is at an end. The same principle is established in our county courts in the administration of the law. It is the same principle that we propose to establish here for the settlement of controversies between this and foreign Governments. It has been successful when tried before, and it will be successful hereafter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAINE's and Mr. PILE's amendments were agreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. ELIOT's amendment, as follows:

Strike out these words:

The President is hereby empowered to suspend in part or wholly all commercial relations with such Government; and in case no other remedy is available, to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, except ambassadors and other public ministers and their domestics and domestic servants, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

Such delay and refusal shall be regarded as an offense to the United States incompatible with friendly relations toward such foreign Government.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Mr. INGERSOLL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 50, not voting 79; as follows:

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 4, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Donnelly, Briggs, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Judd, Kelsey, Ketchum, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Jenckes, and Loan—4.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Churchill, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, William Lawrenco, Lincoln, Lynch, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Nowcomb, Nicholson, Peters, Poland, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—81.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. TABER stated that Mr. Fox was absent from the House on important business; if present, he would have voted for the bill.

Mr. BROOMALL stated that Mr. KELLEY was necessarily absent on public business.

Mr. ORTH announced that his colleagues, Mr. JULIAN and Mr. HUNTER, were absent on leave; if present, they would have voted for the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL said: I ask that permission be given to those members who are absent to record their votes on this bill.

The SPEAKER. There is no precedent for such a proceeding. No authority was ever given in the whole history of the Government when a bill passed to allow gentlemen afterward to come in and record their votes. Sometimes, by a suspension of the rules under the new rule, such authority has been given, but never in advance.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 370, to prevent the further sale of the public lands of the United States except as provided for in the preemption and homestead laws, and the laws for disposing of town sites and mineral lands. The gentleman who has charge of that bill [Mr. JULIAN] has been called home in consequence of sickness in his family. But the Chair has been informed that two members of this House will be ready to speak upon the bill to-morrow, one in favor of and one in opposition to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the House to vote upon my resolution to recall our managers in the matter of the impeachment of the President.

AMENDMENT OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask unanimous consent for the Committee on Revision of Laws to report to-morrow, after the morning hour, the bill amendatory of the bankrupt law. Unless it shall have passed both Houses before the 1st of June it will prove unavailing.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object at this time; though I may not object to-morrow, after I shall have had an opportunity to read the bill.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the committee be authorized to report the bill at that time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] propose to allow any discussion of the bill?

Mr. JENCKES. I do not suppose any will be necessary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask consent for the gentleman from Rhode Island to take five minutes to explain the amendatory bill to which he refers.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object, unless time is allowed to reply to him.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] can satisfy the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] that his bill is a perfectly proper one. It is a bill, as the gentleman from Rhode Island says, of public importance, and perfectly unobjectionable. I ask that he be allowed to state what the bill proposes to accomplish.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This bill, I take it, is like all other bills in that respect. The gentleman from Rhode Island undoubtedly thinks it is a very just bill; I do not know but it may be. But there are very many other just propositions which have equal rights with this one. That is the reason why I object to its being made a special order to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. JENCKES. I insist upon my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the Committee on Revision of Laws be authorized to report this bill to-morrow after the morning hour.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 77, noes 19.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and leave granted accordingly.

SABINE.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas the Secretary of the Navy, on the application of certain persons not officially connected with the administration of the Navy Department, recently caused the Sabine, a vessel belonging to the United States Navy, to be detained for several days in the harbor of New London, after said vessel had been ordered out of commission and away from said harbor of New London, at an expense of more than twenty thousand dollars and to the prejudice of the public service: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House the number of days said vessel was detained and the reason of said detention; the number of men connected with said vessel and the daily and aggregate expense of said vessel and men while thus detained; also, to communicate the entire correspondence that passed between the Navy Department and Hon. Frederick L. Allen, Hon. James Dixon, and Hon. Frederick L. Allen, Hon. James Dixon, and any other person or persons, in regard to this subject, together with a copy of the "descriptive list" of said vessel now in the possession of the Navy Department, and also a copy of all letters and telegrams sent and received in relation to the same; also, a copy of any letter or letters or telegrams relating to this subject exhibited by any person or persons asking for the detention of said vessel for partisan or political purposes, or for other reasons; also, to communicate to this House what representations, verbal or otherwise, were made on this subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] will modify the preamble of his resolution by striking out the words "and to the prejudice of the public service" I will not object to it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I have no objection to striking out those words, although I have no doubt such is the fact.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not want to vote for any such declaration.

The preamble and resolution, as modified, were received by unanimous consent, and adopted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence for two weeks was granted to Mr. MARSHALL.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the House to consider to-morrow, after the morning hour, two appropriation bills having reference to benevolent institutions in this District.

LIGHTING THE HALL.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on Accounts relative to lighting the Hall by the galvanic battery now used for lighting the Dome was recommitted. I am willing that this question shall go over till to-morrow morning, if the House desires now to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHANLER: A memorial of A. S. Diven, C. W. Durant, E. C. Litchfield, and others, in favor of the New York and Washington railway.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A memorial of J. W. Jack, praying that $300 commutation funds may be refunded.

Also, a remonstrance of 98 citizens of Cincinnati, against the extension of Howe's patent on sewing-machines.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of Thomas Nye, jr., Joseph C. Delano, and others, merchants and ship owners of Massachusetts, praying for the erection of breakwaters at the entrance of Cuttahunk harbor, in Vineyard sound.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Charles O. Williams, for bounty.

Also, the petition of officers of the Army on the subject of the pay of officers on the retired list.

By Mr. LOAN: The petition of Captain W. B. Hamilton, for an increase of pension.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Catharine Payne, mother of Michael Bayne, deceased, late of company A, sixth New Jersey volunteers, for arrears of pension.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, Maryland, for an appropriation to pay rent for occupation by the United States of La Fayette square, and for compensation for damage to same.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of W. W. J. Kelly, of Florida, praying Congress to remove his political disabilities incurred by reason of his service under the rebel flag.

Also, the petition of John W. Hilt, late captain in the twelfth regiment of Ohio volunteers, praying for arrears of pension.

By Mr. TAYLOR: Four petitions of 150 citizens of Virginia, producers and manufacturers of American sumac, in favor of a specific duty on imported sumac.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 21, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. McCARTHY till Monday next.

LIGHTING THE HALL.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the adjournment last evening, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on Accounts relative to lighting the Hall by the galvanic battery now used for lighting the Dome was recommitted. On this question the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution, the passage of which is very desirable, as the subject is being acted on in the Senate.

Mr. PIKE. I object, and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] must proceed or surrender the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. Before the vote is taken on the motion to reconsider I ask that the report of the committee be read. It is short and it sets out all the facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, who were instructed by resolution of the House of February 22, 1868, to inquire into the expediency and the expense of causing the gas over the Hall to be lighted by electricity from the battery now used for lighting the Rotunda and Dome, make report:

The mode of lighting the gas over the Hall now in use is this:

A pipe, called a carrier tube, about one inch in diameter, in which are inserted at intervals of an inch small jets or burners, passes the burners which light the Hall, and when fire is communicated to the jets at one end it passes from jet to jet and lights the burners.

The proposed mode is to put a wire in the place of the carrier tube and connect it with the galvanic battery used for lighting the Dome, so that the electricity being communicated to the wire will immediately light the burners as soon as the gas is emitted. After careful investigation the committee are of opinion that the following advantages will result from the proposed change:

1. The expense of keeping the carrier tube and jets in order will be saved. This expense is shown to the satisfaction of the committee to be about eight hundred or a thousand dollars a year. There are nine thousand six hundred and seventy jets or small burners in the carrier tube. To prevent the extravagant use of gas these jets are very small, eight of them emitting about a cubic foot of gas per hour. By the decrease of the size of these jets their liability to become obstructed and out of order is increased. The obstruction of a single jet frequently stops the progress of the fire. Two jets together obstructed almost always stops the communication. Hence the jets require frequent cleaning and removing. This constitutes the great item of expense attending it.

The annual cost of the proposed substitute will be very little.

The entire expense of the similar apparatus for lighting the Rotunda and Dome in the way of repairs is about sixty dollars a year.

2. The waste of gas during the time required to light by the carrier tube will be prevented, and the amount used by the carrier tube saved.

The time occupied in lighting is about ten minutes. The amount of gas consumed by the twelve hundred and sixty six-foot burners is about six thousand feet per hour, and that used by the jets about twelve hundred feet, making the amount used by both about twelve hundred feet in ten minutes, costing, at the present rate, $4 20 per evening.

Assuming the number of evenings during which the Hall is lighted to be thirty per annum, the number during the past year, and the expense saved on this account would be $136 annually.

3. Much of the gas discharged by both jets and burners during the time of lighting is not consumed, but, as every member of the House knows, is suffered to escape and pervade the atmosphere of the Hall, rendering it for some time not only unpleasant to breathe, but very injurious to health.

4. By the present mode it is necessary for the person lighting the Hall to remain in the place where the lights are during the time of lighting, to attend to the carrier tube, and prevent the flame from stopping, by reason of obstructed jets.

This is not only pernicious to the individual so compelled to breathe the noxious atmosphere, but dangerous both to him and the occupants of the Hall. The effect produced upon him is often that of partial insensibility, and the consequences of falling in such a place may be easily foreseen.

The recent accident, by which a member and an ex-member of the House were injured by the falling of broken glass, was attributed to this cause.

These are the material advantages of the proposed change; and in the opinion of the committee they are sufficient to justify it.

If the proposed mode of lighting should be adopted, the committee would recommend other changes. The present burners are metallic, and hence liable to corrosion. Many of them are already so corroded as to require renewing; probably all of them will require it within the next year. The committee have examined the lava-tipped burners used in the Dome, and are satisfied of their much greater durability than metallic ones, and of their entire freedom from corrosion. It is only while a metallic burner is new that its action is perfect, that the whole of the gas emitted is consumed, and consumed to the best advantage. The lava-tipped burners, on the other hand, remain the same.

From some experiments made by the direction of the committee it has been shown that the horizontal direction of the present burners prevents, to some extent, the proper combustion of the gas, and hence fails to attain all the light of which the gas is capable.

These experiments have shown that twenty-two upright burners placed immediately over the large sash in each of the panels will produce as much light as the twenty-eight horizontal burners placed as they now are.

By this change two hundred and forty-six burners may be saved, and counting six hours to the evening, and thirty evenings to the year, the amount saved would be about one hundred and thirty-seven dollars per annum on this account.

Throwing aside the danger to health and life of the present mode, the committee are of opinion that the actual saving of expense by all the proposed changes would be about one thousand dollars per annum.

The committee further report that the expense of changing the mode of lighting as proposed, and changing the burners and their position, will not exceed $6,600.

And they believe that this expense will be much more than compensated by the annual saving. On this account, and because the committee are satisfied that the proposed change will conduce to the health and safety of the occupants of the Hall, they recommend the passage of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to cause the carrier tube now used for lighting the burners of the Hall to be removed, as well as the burners and the pipe in which they are inserted, and to cause a pipe furnished with lava-tipped burners to be placed in the most advantageous position over each panel, and to be so connected with the battery used for lighting the Dome as to be lighted therefrom.

Resolved, That the work be done under the direction of the architect of the Capitol extension, and that the expense be paid out of the contingent fund of the House: Provided, That the same shall not exceed $6,600.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the recommitment will be reconsidered, and the resolutions reported by the Committee on Accounts will be regarded as pending before the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I was about to say that I do not wish to occupy the time of the House longer than may be necessary; and any explanation which may be desired might as well be given by answering questions as in any other way.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask what is the necessity for any action of the House on this subject? From the statements made in the report this change in the mode of lighting the Hall ought obviously to be made. But why cannot the thing be done and paid for out of the contingent fund without any action on the part of the House?

Mr. BROOMALL. It is not entirely clear that under existing laws it can be done without any action of the House. It certainly can be done if these resolutions be adopted. I am not sure that the Clerk has not the power to do it without such action; and he is not sure. But he doubts his power; and inasmuch as there was a doubt the matter was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and these resolutions are the result.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, then, let the resolutions be passed.

Mr. BROOMALL. If no other gentleman desires information, I will call the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Hall be better lighted by the method proposed?

Mr. BROOMALL. There is no doubt that the Hall will be better lighted. This has been shown by an experiment which has been made under the direction of the committee with one of the panels.

I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, passed February 24, 1868, and all the proceedings of this House amendatory thereof, or supplementary thereto, be, and the same are hereby, rescinded, and the managers on the part of the House be recalled from the further prosecution of said impeachment.

Mr. MULLINS. I move that be laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the Chair decide that to be a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, then, to its reception.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to its reception and consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the rule read on the subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How can the gentleman from Illinois object to a question of privilege?

Mr. ROBINSON. And I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule from page 71 of the Digest.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not yield for any motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to it as a question of right.

The Clerk read as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member or is deemed necessary by the Speaker."

"RULE 41.—And it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report even though a question of privilege is involved in the report.—Journal, 1, 35, pp. 1083, 1085.

"But after a question has been stated and its discussion commenced, it is too late to raise the question of consideration."—Journal, 1, 17, pp. 296, 297.

The SPEAKER. This has been the ruling previously in the House, and the Chair will have read the decision of Mr. Speaker Orr, in the first session Thirty-Fifth Congress, in a case of the highest privilege, the right of a member to a seat upon this floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. Thomas L. Harris having proposed to call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of W. Pinckney Whyte, contesting the right of J. Morrison Harris to a seat in the House from the State of Maryland, Mr. Israel Washburn, Jr., demanded that the question be put, 'Will the House now consider it?' Mr. Thomas L. Harris made the point of order that the said report being a question of privilege, it was not competent for a member to raise the question of consideration. The Speaker overruled the said point of order, and decided that under the fifth rule of the House it was competent for a majority, upon the demand of a member, to determine whether they would now consider the report."

The SPEAKER. From the decision of Mr. Speaker Orr Mr. Houston, of Alabama, appealed; and Mr. ELIUS B. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the appeal be laid upon the table; and the question being put it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 66. That settled the parliamentary construction of the rule which is now the forty-first rule.

The reason for this rule is obvious. A member might move that the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from New York should be expelled from the House and then claim the right to make a speech before the House decided whether it should consider the question or not. The ruling of Speaker Orr was no doubt correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no doubt the proceedings in the other House will soon induce this House to adopt my resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Can the gentleman from New York be taken from the floor?

The SPEAKER. He certainly can. And the Chair will refer the gentleman from Wisconsin to a decision made by Mr. Speaker Barbour, of Virginia, in the Seventeenth Congress. It will be found on page 296 of the Journal of the first session of the Seventeenth Congress, where Mr. Whitman offered resolutions in regard to the disposition of the documents accompanying President Monroe's message on the 28th of January:

"Which being read, Mr. Whitman then proceeded in his argument until Mr. Rhea demanded that the question be put, 'Will the House now consider it?' which demand was declared out of order, for that it had not been deemed necessary by the Speaker nor demanded by any member until the mover had proceeded to discuss his resolutions and was actually discussing them.

"From this decision of the Chair Mr. Nelson, of Virginia, appealed to the House.

"And on the question, 'Is the decision of the Speaker correct?' (which was the way then of taking an appeal) it passed in the affirmative."

The ruling, therefore, was made by that decision of the Seventeenth Congress that the point as to the consideration of a resolution or report must be made instantly upon its presentation, and not after the discussion has commenced.

Mr. ROBINSON. I raise this point of order. Perhaps I have not distinctly heard everything that the Speaker read and said. But is it in order for the gentleman from Illinois, when a member is upon the floor, to take the floor from him without his consent and raise such a question as this?

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the rule says.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not hear it distinctly, but I will not ask the Speaker to read it again.

The SPEAKER. The construction of two Congresses on appeals from the decision of the Speaker has settled the question that this point can be made when a member is upon the floor, and must be made when the resolution or report first comes before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Although I did not hear the exact point, if that is the decision I am content.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state as a matter akin to this that during the morning hour on Mondays members are authorized to introduce bills and joint resolutions for reference, and yet in the Thirty-Ninth Congress it was decided that this point could be made after granting leave to a member to bring in a bill for reference; and on the yeas and nays once in the Thirty-Ninth Congress the House refused to allow a member to introduce a bill at the time it was presented. That case is akin to this. The question is "Will the House now consider the resolution?"

Mr. ROBINSON. Having been overruled, I wish to avail myself of all the privileges of the House, and I demand the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 93, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Beek, Boyer, Cary, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Jones, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Robinson, Sitgroves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, and Van Trump—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Dolos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Calk, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Curllom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Briggs, Eggleston, Eli, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Judd, Kelsey, Ketchum, Keontz, Laffin, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Price, Raum, Robertson, Seofield, Shaunks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Talle, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Unson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Walker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—93.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Arnell, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Burr, Butler, Chandler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Dodge, Eckley, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall, McCormick, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Peters, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Auker, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—78.

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANAGERS OF IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at the present time:

Whereas there appeared in the Baltimore American newspaper of the 15th of April, 1868, the following paragraph:

"General Sherman before the Managers.

"Lieutenant General Sherman was before the impeachment managers for a considerable time, and was very minutely examined in relation to his interviews with the President at the time of the proffer of the War Department to him. It is understood that the declination of General Sherman to proceed with the cross-examination of General Sherman yesterday was in view of this preliminary examination of General Sherman this morning."

And whereas "false and scandalous reports of proceedings in this House"—"charges affecting the official character of its members," and "alleged combinations on the part of certain members," as questions of high privilege, demand that such indecent imputations are contained in the above-recited paragraph upon the official conduct of the honorable managers appointed by the House of Representatives to conduct the trial of the impeachment of the President at the bar of the Senate of the United States should not be promulgated without proper action on the part of this House to vindicate the reputation of its officers and its own dignity:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to inquire into the truth or falsity of the imputations conveyed in the above-recited paragraph, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report what action, if any, should further be taken in the premises.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order, that this is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that this is not a question of privilege, and will state his reasons. Although the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] has noted upon his resolution references to pages 154 and 155 of the Digest, which relate to questions of privilege, if he will examine the authorities there quoted he will find that the charges are not to be general charges. If a charge is made by a newspaper affecting the official character of a member of this House, that would be a question of privilege. If an attack should be made by the Public Printer, and the Chair would add, by the publisher of any paper, in an article alleged to be for the purpose of inciting unlawful violence upon members, that would be a privileged question, because relating to the privileges of the House. If alleged corrupt combinations on the part of certain members were presented, those would be questions of privilege. But the corrupt combination must be charged, and the statement of the corrupt combination must be incorporated in the resolution. In the extract which the gentleman has quoted in his resolution, and which the Chair will again read, upon which extract the gentleman bases his demand that this shall be considered a question of privilege, it is stated that—

"Lieutenant General Sherman was before the impeachment managers for a considerable time, and was very minutely examined in relation to his interviews with the President at the time of the proffer of the War Department to him. It is understood that the declination of General Sherman to proceed with the cross-examination of General Sherman yesterday was in view of this preliminary examination of General Sherman this morning."

The Chair is unable to see how, even by the utmost stretching of the rule, that could be construed into a question of privilege. But if the gentleman from Maryland desires it the Chair will submit the question to the House whether this is or is not a question of privilege.

Mr. PHELPS. I would like to have that question presented to the House, as in my judgment it is clearly within the clause of the rules relating to matters affecting the character of members. The paragraph quoted mentions one of the honorable managers by name. He is said to have declined to cross-examine a witness publicly before the Senate and the country, in order that he and his co-managers might have an opportunity to cross-examine him privately, without that publicity which would be had in a court of justice; in other words, that they might probe the witness and see whether it was safe to venture upon a public cross-examination of him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has now heard the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. PHELPS], and will decide against him on two grounds: the first ground is that, in the action quoted in this paragraph, the managers did exactly what the House of Representatives instructed them to do, when it authorized them to send for persons and papers and take the testimony of witnesses. That they had a perfect right to do. In the second place, if this proposition could be entertained as a question of privilege, the House of Representatives would or could have resolutions upon questions of privilege before them every day, because probably not a day elapses without some newspaper in the country making a general charge against the Congress of the United States or some of its members. These charges must be specific charges. A general charge that some conduct has been scandalous and unjust, the Chair will rule, is not a question of privilege, unless the gentleman from Maryland desires to have that question submitted to the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I would prefer to have the decision of the House on the question.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the request of the gentleman from Maryland, the Chair will submit to the House the question, "Will the House entertain this resolution as a question of privilege?"

Mr. PHELPS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes fourteen, noes not counted.

Mr. PHELPS. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; there being—ayes fourteen.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The vote being taken on the question, "Will the House entertain the resolution as a question of privilege?" it was decided in the negative.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the House consider the resolution and appoint the committee without any debate upon the question.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

SAFETY OF STEAM TRAVEL.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 217) for the relief of Beals & Dixon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Appropriations.

The reports were presented from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The next committee in regular order would be the Committee on Banking and Currency; but that committee on the 28th of January last exchanged places by unanimous consent with the Committee on Naval Affairs, who are, therefore, entitled to the two morning hours of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. PIKE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely joint resolution (H. R. No. 3) in regard to naval officers visiting the capital; which was laid on the table.

SUSPENDING WORK ON WAR VESSELS.

Mr. PIKE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely a resolution explanatory of the resolution adopted November 25, 1867, in reference to suspending work on war vessels; which was laid on the table.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. PIKE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely a petition of the assistant professors of the Naval Academy for increase of pay; which was laid on the table.

Mr. PIKE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 196) concerning the promotion of officers who have been restored to the active list in the United States Navy; which was laid on the table.

LIFE-BOAT STATIONS ON NEW JERSEY COAST.

Mr. PIKE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a petition of citizens of New Jersey, for a change of the district and superintendents of life-boat stations on the coast of New Jersey, and moved its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

DISMAL SWAMP CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. PIKE, from the same committee, made an adverse report on House joint resolution No. 170, in reference to stock held by the United States in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company; and the same was laid on the table.

Petition of workingmen in the navy-yard, relative to repeal of House resolution recommending suspension of work in the navy-yards.

WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. BANKS. What is it that the committee reports in regard to the Washington navy-yard?

Mr. PIKE. We report adversely on the petition asking for the repeal of the resolution passed by the House in regard to the construction of naval vessels.

Mr. BANKS. Does the committee propose any action in regard to that resolution?

Mr. PIKE. It does not.

Mr. BANKS. Am I to understand that the object of the petitioners is substantially complied with?

Mr. PIKE. We report adversely on the petition. I will state to the House how the matter stands. A resolution passed this House early in December that in the judgment of this House further work should not be done in equipping or constructing ships of war. The petition from the Washington navy-yard asks that resolution shall be rescinded so far as regards that yard. The committee report adversely on that petition.

Mr. BANKS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the committee intend to report in favor of the resolution hereafter?

Mr. PIKE. I have not said so. We want the resolution to stand as it is.

TREVETT ABBOTT, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 358, providing for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Trevett Abbott, United States Navy, to the active list of the Navy, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Navy to order Trevett Abbott, lieutenant commander in United States Navy on the retired list, before the retiring board of the Navy for examination, and if on examination he be pronounced morally, professionally, and personally competent for active service, then the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to restore him to the active list with the same grade as if he had not been retired.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POWDER MAGAZINES.

Mr. PIKE, from the same committee, also reported back Senate joint resolution No. 118, for the appointment of a commission to select suitable locations for powder magazines, with the recommendation that it do pass.

It directs the Secretary of the Navy to select three competent officers of the Navy to constitute a commission, whose duty it shall be to examine and report on the practicability of securing more suitable sites for powder magazines than those now used in the vicinity of New York, Boston, and Portsmouth, New Hampshire; and also to report the cost of procuring said sites and of erecting powder magazines thereon.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. DOTY, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. PIKE, from the same committee, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 126, for the relief of George W. Doty, a commander in the United States Navy on the retired list, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution directs that the name of George W. Doty, commander in the United States Navy, be placed in the Navy Register as commander from 16th July, 1862, the date of his commission.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM.

Mr. PIKE, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Government, in the settlement of the accounts of John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy, to allow a credit to him of $1,671 07, the amount of public money stolen from the money chest of the United States frigate Colorado while said chest was under his charge.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there a report?

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to hear the report in this case.

Mr. PIKE. A report accompanies the bill, and I ask that it be read. It is a matter of $1,600, and the report explains it.

The report was read. It sets forth that John S. Cunningham is a paymaster in the Navy, and during the years 1865 and 1866 was fleet paymaster on board the United States frigate Colorado, flagship of the United States European squadron. Between the months of August, 1865, and February, 1866, the safe in which he kept the public money on board that ship was repeatedly opened by Riley and Watts, two seamen belonging to the ship, and money was abstracted therefrom, said by Paymaster Cunningham to amount to $1,671 07, for which robbery, after trial and conviction, the prisoners themselves confessing the acts, the said Riley and Watts were sentenced to five years' imprisonment and a forfeiture of all pay and allowances due or to become due to them. It does not appear that the petitioner was in any way careless or remiss, and the committee recommend the passage of the bill for his relief.

Mr. UPSON. I would like to inquire whether there is any other evidence as to the amount of the loss except the statement of the claimant?

Mr. PIKE. There is none.

Mr. UPSON. Is it not rather a loose rule to take his word for the amount?

Mr. PIKE. I will state in relation to this matter that this loss occurred on board the steamship Colorado. The money was taken from the chest from time to time by means of false keys by two seamen, and the theft was discovered by one of the confederates confessing it to the surgeon. It seems that Paymaster Cunningham discovered from time to time that money had been taken. He is, by the testimony of all his associates, a very careful man, careful in the management of the money and of the safe, which was, of itself, of a very poor quality. This thing ran along for some months, and finally, by a confession made to the surgeon, it was discovered who the parties who stole the money were. They were then arraigned and tried by court-martial; the men were convicted, and the judgment of the court having been approved by Admiral Goldsborough, they are now serving out their sentence. Under these circumstances this sum of money was lost. The paymaster's books show that some money was lost; but, of course, it is necessary to repose a degree of confidence in the character of the paymaster in order to ascertain the exact sum. To that extent the House is called upon to trust Paymaster Cunningham, who is a man of exemplary character, of very high personal consideration among his associates, well known here in Washington for a long period of years, and recommended by everybody who has known him as a gentleman of entire honesty. The Navy Department and the accounting officers of the Treasury have no doubt of the facts, but they have no authority to make the allowance, and this bill authorizes them to make the allowance. The bill has passed the Senate, and it is under these circumstances that the House is asked to pass it.

Mr. COBB. I would like to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. COBB. Was there any evidence before the committee fixing the amount of the money stolen?

Mr. PIKE. That was precisely the question of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. COBB. Was there any evidence to show that these men confessed to having taken any specific amount?

Mr. PIKE. These men confessed to having taken money from time to time, and when the vessel was in foreign ports they went on shore and spent the money.

Mr. COBB. I wish to inquire whether the records of the court-martial have been before the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. PIKE. There is a statement with the papers in relation to the court-martial.

Mr. COBB. Have the committee had the record of the court-martial before them?

Mr. PIKE. They have examined the record of the court-martial.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman will pardon me for interfering to ask these questions when I state that the only interest I take in the matter is that there are a great number of similar cases now before the Committee of Claims, all of which we have deemed it to be our duty to examine with great minuteness and caution, and I do not wish to see a precedent set here in this case which it could be urged upon us to follow in those cases which are before the Committee of Claims.

Mr. PIKE. I was mistaken; here is a record of the court-martial.

Mr. COBB. I would like to hear read, either by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] or by the Clerk of this House, what evidence there is of the specific sum which was stolen. Or I would ask if the amount is made up only from the books of this paymaster showing what was deficient?

Mr. PIKE. As I stated in reply to a similar inquiry from the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] there is no specific sum proved to have been stolen. The charge is this:

"In this, that the accused did, on one or more occasions, between the months of August, 1865, and February, 1866, as principal or accessory, thieves from the iron chest in the ward-room of this ship, in which chest public money in charge of Paymaster John S. Cunningham was there kept, a sum or sums of money."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] a question.

Mr. PIKE. Very well.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand the gentleman to say that there is nothing in the papers before the committee which indicates the specific sum lost. Now, I would like to know how the committee came to report a specific sum in this bill. Do they guess at it, or how do they get at it?

Mr. PIKE. I have frankly stated to the House, for I have no motives for concealment in this case, that there is no testimony before the committee in relation to the precise sum. In regard to that sum the House must take the statement of the paymaster, and rely upon his character and honesty.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman state whether there appears in the record the statement of the paymaster, either made under oath or by report to the Department?

Mr. PIKE. It does.

Mr. MAYNARD. If this paymaster were suing a common carrier or a landlord for money abstracted, his statement would be accepted as satisfactory in regard to the amount taken, it being proved abunde that some amount was taken. It seems to me that we should not here exact a more rigorous measure of evidence than would be required in a litigation between individuals.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to state that such is the law?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know it is the rule of law, so far as clothing and ordinary baggage is concerned; but it is not the rule so far as money is concerned. An express company or common carrier is not liable for money carried by them unless a specific statement is made of the amount claimed.

Mr. PIKE. I do not wish to rest this simply upon character.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I believe it is universally held, so far as I am aware, that a party may be allowed to state the amount of money, where it is a sum not incommensurate with the necessities of personal expenditure. In some courts they have gone even further than that and allowed the statement to extend generally.

Mr. PIKE. I have here the statement of the surgeon of the ship, from which I read as follows:

"That some time before the discovery of the robbery by (Paymaster John S. Cunningham) had expressed his want of confidence in the safe as to its security; that my state-room was in the near vicinity of the safe, and that I never saw any other person visit it but himself, and that on such occasions I always observed that he assured himself of its fastness before leaving it; that there was no guard kept at the ward-room doors during the night, and that persons might enter it and tamper with the safe when the officers were in their several state-rooms and asleep, without necessarily attracting observation; that for some time the stationary light of the ward-room was unlit during a part of the night, when that apartment was in darkness; that Paymaster Cunningham was always careful and anxious of his charge, and under the circumstances he does not appear to me to be at all accountable for the robbery of the safe."

Then, here is a statement of the officers of the ship Colorado in relation to the general character of the paymaster:

"We, the undersigned, officers of the United States ship Colorado, attached to said vessel at the time of the robberies of the safe of Paymaster Cunningham, in the year 1866, and acquainted with the circumstances connected therewith, do hereby attest our belief that the said robberies were not in any way due to negligence or want of proper precautions on the part of Paymaster Cunningham. We also believe the said robberies to have been systematically planned by experts and executed in spite of the usual precautions adopted on board ship for the protection of public property."

This is signed by the fleet surgeon, the captain, the engineer, and all the other officers of the ship.

Now, I will say that, except by the passage of such a bill as this, there is no possible way in which this applicant can be relieved. This is not like the case of a man outside of the Government service proposing to prove by his own testimony that the Government owes him a large sum of money. Nor is it like a case in which a man proposes to prove by his own testimony the loss of a bond for which he seeks reimbursement. It is no such case. Here is the case of a disbursing officer of the Government suffering a loss by robbery while engaged in the proper discharge of his duties as such disbursing officer. He is proved to have exercised all due and proper vigilance. There is no way in which the exact amount of the loss can be proved abunde. Thieves, by the use of false keys, abstract from day to day or from week to week small sums of money from the safe of this paymaster. He misses the money from time to time, but is unable to account for the deficiency. He watches carefully, and finally by the confession of these men the robbery is ascertained. In order to fix the precise sum of money abstracted we are obliged to trust to the honor and honesty of this man.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the disbursing officer state in his affidavit the exact amount of money that he lost?

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. Then I would merely remind gentlemen that an act of Congress has been passed making the evidence of parties competent evidence, and, if not contradicted, sufficient evidence in the courts of the United States. This corresponds with the law in a number of the States of this Union.

Mr. PIKE. I suppose there is no question as to the competency of the testimony in this case.

Mr. WELKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question. How long before this robbery had this paymaster settled his accounts?

Mr. PIKE. He did not settle his accounts till after the return of the ship last July, and the robbery occurred previous to that time.

Mr. WELKER. How long previous was his last settlement—a year or six months?

Mr. PIKE. It was before the sailing of the ship. The Colorado was the flag-ship.

Mr. WELKER. How long was she gone?

Mr. PIKE. Two years, I should think.

Mr. WELKER. Does the bill propose to balance up the paymaster's account so as to cover the deficiency in the account at the time when the robbery occurred?

Mr. PIKE. There was no appearance of a deficiency in the account.

Mr. WELKER. Is it proposed to credit him with this sum of money so as to square his account with the Government?

Mr. PIKE. In reply to that, I will say that previous to this abstraction the paymaster's accounts did balance.

Mr. WELKER. How long before?

Mr. PIKE. Immediately previous. During the time when the abstractions were going on the accounts, of course, would not balance. These paymaster's books, like the books of other disbursing officers, are balanced from day to day.

Mr. WELKER. How does the gentleman know that the accounts balanced previous to the robbery?

Mr. PIKE. From testimony—the only way in which we can know anything of this kind.

Mr. WELKER. From whose statement?

Mr. PIKE. From the paymaster's statement and from the books themselves.

Mr. WELKER. I make this suggestion, not because I mean to intimate that there has been anything wrong in this man's accounts, but because it would be very easy in squaring these accounts of public officers to say that a certain loss or robbery just covers the amount of the deficiency. Hence in examining a matter of this kind a committee should be careful not to be misled by statements, unsupported by evidence, as to the amount actually abstracted.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say that in this case it is impossible to obtain evidence of the amount of money stolen unless the testimony of the paymaster shall be taken. That testimony is given, as I understand, under oath, and he is known to many gentlemen of this House who will not believe that under any circumstances whatever he could be induced to commit perjury. The men who committed this robbery were unable to state the amount of money stolen. They confess that they had opened the safe several times and that money had been taken, but it is not in their power, so it appears, to state the amount that they took.

Mr. WELKER. Is the paymaster's affidavit on file?

Mr. BANKS. So I understand.

Mr. PIKE. The paymaster's full statement is on file, but whether under oath or not I do not know.

Mr. BANKS. Here is a statement of the manner in which this discovery was made. It shows conclusively on its face that it is a true statement.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I make the suggestion whether it is not better that this bill should be referred to the Committee of Claims. We have now before that committee claims of this character from paymasters in the Army, internal revenue officers, and many other officers who disburse public money, asking for relief of this character. We have endeavored to mature a uniform provision of law in regard to all such claims. If we adopt one system for naval officers, another for Army officers, and still another for internal revenue officers, it seems to me it will lead to confusion. It will not only lead to great confusion, but, sir, injustice will be done to some of these officers, if indeed injustice will not be done to the Government. If the gentleman from Maine will yield to me I will move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims, to which committee all such claims have been referred.

Mr. PIKE. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Speaker, this claim seems to have been fairly investigated by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and therefore I do not see any propriety in taking it away from the action of that committee and referring it to the Committee of Claims. I am surprised that the gentleman from Wisconsin should suggest such a course when the Committee of Claims, as it is admitted, have now before them more claims than they can investigate during this session of Congress. The Committee on Naval Affairs have investigated this claim, and reported that it is just and should be allowed. Now, one word in regard to this matter. It seems to me that we have all the evidence in this case we can have in any case; and if Congress is to pay any claim proved to be just and proper then it ought to pay this claim. If it does not mean to pay any of these claims, if the Government can afford to say that it will not pay any of these claims, however just they may be, and will refuse to act on them, then this, as well as other just cases, will be rejected; but, sir, if we pay any class of cases of this kind then we ought promptly to pay this one. It has been investigated, and the committee has reported in favor of it; and I hope, therefore, that it will be passed.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

Mr. PIKE. I have other important business, and I cannot yield further. I wish only to make a remark. Here is the whole length and breadth of this case. No committee can supply the want of testimony, neither this nor any other committee, and the House must trust to this extent to the committee. It seems to me it is not fair to take this small amount from a worthy officer, a man of high character; but if it is to be done let the bill be voted down and not referred to another committee, and still further postponed. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. PIKE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1023) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that from and after the passage of this act the Marine corps shall consist of the number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and musicians authorized by the act for the increase of the Marine corps of the United States, approved March 2, 1847, and the acts previous thereto, and of fifteen hundred privates, and repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith; provided that the commissions of officers now in the Marine corps shall not be vacated by this act, but no appointment shall be made in any of the grades of said corps until the number in said corps is reduced below the number herein provided for each of said grades.

The second section provides that no appointment of engineers shall be made in either of the grades of said corps until the number is reduced below that provided in the first section of the act to regulate the appointment and pay of engineers in the Navy of the United States, approved August 31, 1842, and the number so authorized shall be based upon the number of steamships in commission. And it also abolishes the grade of third assistant engineer.

The third section repeals the second section of an act entitled "An act to increase the pay of midshipmen and others," approved March 3, 1865, and the ninth section of an act entitled "An act to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy," approved March 2, 1867; provided the repeal of said section shall not be construed to increase the pay now allowed by law to officers promoted in accordance with its provisions.

The fourth section repeals all acts and parts of acts authorizing the appointment of temporary acting officers in the Navy.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I am asked to explain this bill, and I will do it very briefly. I wish to call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to this bill, and to remind him of the expression of a doubt by him in the discussion which occurred here a month or two ago in relation to the purpose of the Naval Committee, when he attempted to make a partial reform in the management of our naval ships, and he was replied to at the time that the Naval Committee had in preparation a bill which would be very much more thorough. I now call his attention to this bill.

The first section provides for reducing the rank and file of the Marine corps to fifteen hundred men. It is now three thousand men. At the beginning of the war the number was fixed by law at two thousand, although the actual number was only between fourteen hundred and fifteen hundred. By the law of 1861 the number was increased to twenty-five hundred, and by the act of the Executive without law it was increased to about thirty-five hundred. It was proposed, I think, by the gentleman from Illinois to reduce the Marine corps to twenty-five hundred men. Upon full consideration the Committee on Naval Affairs have come to the conclusion that it should be reduced to fifteen hundred men.

This force is in use in our naval vessels as a police force merely, and a large number is not necessary in any one vessel. I believe the number employed on board a vessel is from ten or fifteen up to fifty; and as we have but fifty vessels in the service, it is quite apparent that we do not need as large a number of men as is now authorized by law. It is not thought fair to throw out the officers who now hold commissions in this branch of the service, like other officers in the Army and in the Navy, reckoning upon a life service and abandoning other pursuits to take positions in this corps; and for that reason it has been provided in this bill that the commissions of officers now in the Marine corps shall not be vacated by this act, but that no appointments shall be made in any grade of the corps until the number in the corps is reduced below the number provided by this bill for each grade. The reduction is very rapid from resignation and casualty, both in the Army and in the Navy.

The next section provides that no appointment of engineers shall be made in either of the grades until the number is reduced to a certain number for each vessel. Before the war we had about one hundred and forty engineers. During the war we had a very large number, and by the last Naval Register I see that about five hundred remain in the service. We need more engineers than before the war; but it is quite apparent that we do not need the large number now employed. The number for each vessel was one chief engineer, two first assistants, two second assistants, and three third assistants. The grade of third assistant engineer it is proposed by this bill to abolish. That will give about two hundred and fifty, which, upon investigation, we think, is about the proper number, as our Navy is now composed wholly of steam vessels.

The next section provides for the repeal of an act in relation to mates, providing that the Department shall be authorized to give sixty dollars a month to mates. It practically proposes to abolish the grade of mates. It is supposed that midshipmen and passed midshipmen can do the duty of this grade.

Another portion of the section provides that an act passed in March last shall be repealed. That act provided that officers on the retired list might be promoted as their dates are promoted on the active list. The result has been to fill up the higher grades of the retired list of the Navy with officers retired long ago and for all manner of reasons. It provided the pay should not be increased above that received by the officer when he was retired. But by some construction of the Attorney General the executive department concludes that these officers ought to have pay according to the rank they now hold. The Secretary of the Navy does not hold to that opinion, and no pay of the promoted grade has heretofore been given to these officers. But it is deemed proper to repeal the act altogether.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would inquire of the gentleman what is the objection to this law of March, 1867, to which he refers, by which officers on the retired list are to have promotion? Why should they not be promoted, if they deserve it, as well as any other class of officers?

Mr. PIKE. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] we have a statute for persons on the retired list besides the statute proposed to be repealed. It provides that their appointment to a higher grade shall be sent to the Senate for confirmation. But under this law of March, 1867, they are promoted as their dates are promoted on the active list. The operation of that law has been, that in one case a passed midshipman was put on the retired list because of insanity, and he has been insane for the last twenty years, yet he has been promoted as his date has been promoted, and he now appears upon the Naval Register as captain. The whole thing is simply absurd. It makes the retired list, which was meant to be a list of worthy officers, a list of men placed there on account of disease, disabilities incurred in service, or old age, what one of the officers of the Navy styles the "Botany Bay" of the Navy.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. I would ask the gentleman if he considers that these officers should be retained in the service notwithstanding there is no service for them to perform? Does he hold that, in consequence of having been once commissioned in the naval or Marine corps, they have therefore a life estate in the service? Does the gentleman conceive it to be a hardship or a disgrace that they should be dismissed from the service when there is no longer any service which they can perform? I protest against any such doctrine.

I hold that they are in the public service as all other officers are, to be dismissed when the public exigencies no longer require them. They have no life estate in the corps by reason of once having been commissioned in it. Volunteer officers went into our Army and qualified themselves for the service and fought bravely; and then went home again and were dismissed from the service without considering it any hardship or disgrace. And so it should be with these men. Let them retire to private life when the service no longer requires them, which they can do with as little disgrace as these other officers.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] entirely misapprehends my expression as well as the bill itself. I was speaking—and this is the question for the consideration of the House now—in relation to the provision of the act of March 2, 1867, with regard to promotions upon the retired list in the Navy. It is not a question whether these officers shall be retired or not, but whether when they have been retired they shall be promoted. That is the only question.

Mr. HARDING. I understood the gentleman to say that the officers of this corps, embracing three thousand men, are to be retained in service, notwithstanding the reduction.

Mr. PIKE. That is in another part of the bill.

Mr. HARDING. That is the point in reference to which I made inquiry.

Mr. PIKE. In relation to that, as well as in relation to the old officers of the Navy, I am quite sure so generous-hearted a gentleman as my friend from Illinois would not follow out into practice the sentiment he has just expressed.

An old officer of the Navy who has served forty-five years, or come to be sixty-two years of age, has in that time become a part and parcel of the Navy itself. He is an old "sea dog," who knows little of business outside of the Navy, or of obtaining a livelihood in any other way. Would you in the case of a man like that, worn out in the service, say that for the few remaining years of his life he shall not receive even half pay? After he has expended all the energies of his more vigorous manhood in the naval service, would you deny him even the small allowance of half pay, which may afford him some of the necessities and perhaps a few of the comforts of life? Besides, these officers are in many cases very useful for shore service. Many of them are now serving as commandants in our navy-yards and in other valuable service; but many more are on the retired list, like Admiral Stewart, of Philadelphia, who has identified himself in his career with the naval glory of the country. Now, at the age of ninety, he receives the pittance of half pay of the rank he held when he was retired. The gentleman from Illinois certainly would not strike at the commander of Old Ironsides, and leave him entirely without pay?

Mr. HARDING. I desire to say to the gentleman that, whether "generous-hearted" or not, I said no such thing as he imputes to me.

Mr. PIKE. I am very glad of it.

Mr. HARDING. I am surprised that the gentleman misunderstood me. What I said was that I objected to the sentiment that officers holding commissions in this corps, and whose services by reason of this reduction would not be required, shall be retained because they hold commissions. That is the sentiment to which I objected. I have no objections to paying pensions to old and worthy officers—"old sea dogs" or old land dogs, who have served their country faithfully. I would give the last drop in my cup for their comfort in their old age. But, sir, I was speaking of the young officers who have obtained commissions in the exigencies of the last few years, and who now come here exhibiting their commissions and saying, "Though you have nothing for us to do, you must retain us in service till we are old." That I object to.

Mr. PIKE. I am very glad that I misunderstood the gentleman, and that the opinion which he expressed, and which I understood to extend to all officers of the Navy no longer useful, did, in fact, embrace only the Marine corps.

In regard to that corps, as well as to the corps of engineers, it may be said that it reduces itself rapidly by means of resignations and casualties; so that the sum of money which the Government would save if it should to-day discharge every surplus officer would be very small indeed. It has not been deemed wise by the Committee on Naval Affairs, in reference to either of these corps, as it has not been deemed wise by the House, in reference to the Army, to discharge any of these men who have been partially educated in the public service and at the public expense. But very rapidly these corps will be reduced to the numbers fixed by this bill; and it is hardly worth while for us to attempt anything more in that direction.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to ask the gentleman one question in connection with this bill. I notice that it proposes to repeal the act of March 3, 1867, entitled "An act for increasing the pay of midshipmen and other officers of the Navy." I wish to know to what extent the repeal of that act will reduce the pay of midshipmen and other officers?

Mr. PIKE. This does not affect the pay of midshipmen. The second section of the act referred to relates only to the pay of mates.

Mr. SPALDING. Is that all that is to be repealed?

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. So that the pay of midshipmen and lieutenants will not be reduced.

Mr. PIKE. It will not be changed at all. We simply propose to abolish the grade of mate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. You provide for the repeal of the ninth section of the act of March 2, 1867. Now, why do you propose to repeal that provision of the law?

Mr. PIKE. I have just fully explained that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I must have been out. If I understand it I would like to say a word, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. PIKE. My time has almost expired, and I am obliged to call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COASTING TRADE AND FISHERIES.

Mr. PIKE. I am directed to report back from the same committee House joint resolution No. 155, in relation to the vessels enrolled and licensed for employment in the coasting trade and fisheries; and I will ask for the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. PIKE. I will withdraw it after I have made a few remarks on the condition of the commerce of the country, and let the resolution go to the Committee on Commerce.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, nays 11; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the joint resolution will go over until to-morrow.

ANTONIO PELLITIER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, relative to the imprisonment and destruction of the property of Antonio Pellitier by the people and authorities of Hayti; which, on motion of Mr. BANKS, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RUSSIAN AMERICA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, in reference to Russian America; which, on motion of Mr.

BANKS, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, entered the motion to reconsider, to be called up hereafter.

CONFEDERATE PROPERTY IN EUROPE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to certain efforts of that Department for the recovery of confederate property in Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF ALTON, ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the chief of engineers, relative to the improvement of the harbor of Alton, Illinois; which, on motion of Mr. BAKER, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REEDY ISLAND AND LISTON POINT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of survey of Reedy Island and Liston Point, in the Delaware river and bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW BOUNDARY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to the survey of the eastern boundary of the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House, in compliance with law, a statement of the contracts made by the quartermaster's department during March, 1868; which, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. JENCKES, from the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, reported back the following bill:

A bill in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of second clause of the thirty-third section of said act shall not apply to the cases of proceedings in bankruptcy commenced prior to the 1st day of June, A. D., 1869, and the time during which the operation of the provisions of said clause is postponed shall be extended until said 1st day of June, A. D., 1869. And said clause is hereby so amended as to read as follows: in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st day of June, 1869, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to have whom he shall become liable as principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said act be further amended as follows: the phrase "presented or defended" in the fourteenth section of said act shall read "prosecuted or defended;" the phrase "nor resident debtors," in line five, section twenty-two, of the act as printed in the Statutes at Large, shall read "nor resident creditors;" that the word "or," in the next to the last line of the thirty-ninth section of the act, shall read "and;" that the phrase "section thirteen" in the forty-second section of said act shall read "section eleven;" and the phrase "or spends any part thereof in gaming" in the forty-fourth part of said act shall read "or shall spend any part thereof in gaming;" and that the words "with the senior register, or" and the phrase "to be delivered to the register" in the forty-seventh section of said act be stricken out.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That registers in bankruptcy shall have power to administer oaths in all cases and in relation to all matters in which oaths may be administered by commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States, and such commissioners may take proof of debts in bankruptcy in all cases, subject to the revision of such proofs by the register and by the court according to the provisions of said act.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States had before them the various propositions of amendment to the bankrupt act that have been submitted in the House, and have also had before them the reports of registers and the extensive correspondence between the registers and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, in which various other amendments and alterations were suggested. The result of the examination of the whole subject arrived at by the committee was that a great portion of the amendments which have been suggested are immaterial and relate to questions of practice which can be remedied by the courts themselves, and they have found but two substantive matters which they thought, upon all this evidence and upon full consideration, seemed to require amendment.

The second section of the bill as reported corrects some verbal inaccuracies in the act as printed and does no more than make the act symmetrical. There is no alteration made or proposed by that section which materially alters the sense of the law as it stands.

The first section proposes an extension of the time at which the fifty per cent. clause of the act, as it is called, shall take effect. That clause was inserted postponing the operation of it one year from the 1st of June, 1867, when the law went into full operation. It was believed at that time one year would be a sufficient period to clear off all the old wrecks of business, and that the country would become so familiar with the law and so conform to it that this clause might take effect without any injury or shock in the commercial world. Perhaps the clause might take effect now or upon the 1st of June without any shock to actual business, but it has been found that a year has not been a sufficient period to dispose of all these old cases. The testimony is uniform from all the districts that there has not been a sufficient period from the time when the law practically went into operation down to the present time within which to prepare and file the petitions of those who desire to take the benefit of the law. One reason for this, and the principal one, was the delay in the promulgation of the general orders and forms. Without those it was impossible to transact business. They were framed by the Supreme Court and ordered to be printed prior to the 1st of June, 1867, but they were not actually distributed and were not actually in the hands of the profession until some time in July, so that two or three months at least were lost to the profession which they would otherwise have had the benefit of. Those rules and orders with the act itself also had to be studied, which required further time.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman will allow me, I will corroborate him by saying that in many places in the western States the forms did not go into the hands of the profession until August and September.

Mr. JENCKES. I think that is so, and in the southern country it was later still; so that, practically, there were from three to six months lost throughout the whole country.

As I was stating, the character of these general orders and forms required time for their examination and study; and still further time was needed to conform to their requirements. They were framed upon the principle that a case under this law should be prepared and presented by the party seeking relief fully in every respect before going into court; that he should not file papers first and amend them afterward; but that he should, at the threshold, make a full statement of all his affairs. This preparation, in many old cases, was a work of great time and labor; and I think it may be fairly stated that, practically, the country has not had the benefit of the operation of this act fully for more than six months. Upon that ground, and that mainly, it has been deemed expedient that the operation of this clause should be postponed.

The third section remedies an evil which is of very grave magnitude in some of the large congressional districts. It has not been the practice heretofore in the United States courts to appoint a large number of commissioners, nor, until they were required to do so by the civil rights act, have they much enlarged the number. But under the provisions and requirements of that act they are now appointing a commissioner in almost every county in the United States. So that if all commissioners are empowered to take proof of debts, then in every case the creditor will have some one within reach before whom he can make his proof; he can go to some place as convenient as the clerk's office of his county court, where he can take his claim and make proof of it. In large districts, where some judges construe the law to give power only to the register to take proof of debts, for the resident debtor it has been a great hardship, and that will be removed by this bill.

Some doubts also existed, under the construction given to the act by certain judges, as to whether registers could administer oaths in all cases. That doubt has been removed. And this amendatory bill proposes to remove the only serious obstacles which have been found to the full and regular working of the act.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to submit an amendment to the first section of this bill, and to make some remarks upon it. I move to amend by striking out the word "June" where it first occurs and inserting in lieu thereof the word "January."

Mr. JENCKES. I do not wish to yield to have that amendment offered; but I will hear what the gentleman has to say upon it.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not understand that the previous question has yet been demanded.

The SPEAKER. It has not been; but the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] is still upon the floor, which precludes any amendment being offered without his consent.

Mr. ELIOT. Does the gentleman object to my offering that amendment, and having a vote of the House upon it?

Mr. JENCKES. I do; and for this reason—

Mr. ELIOT. Then I will avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES], so far as I can, hoping that before I get through I may prevail upon him to allow me an opportunity to offer that amendment.

I will begin by saying to that gentleman that, in my judgment, it would have been impossible for him to have succeeded in passing the original bill through the House as it was reported by him unless upon the distinct understanding that the provision in the bill, which he now seeks to extend for one year, should be incorporated in it as it passed.

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman wishes simply to take the sense of the House upon his amendment I will allow it to be offered; and before calling the previous question I wish to reply to what the gentleman has to say upon it.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I move to strike out the word "June" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "January" wherever it occurs in the first section; so that it will read as follows:

That the provisions of second clause of the thirty-third section of said act shall not apply to the cases of proceedings in bankruptcy commenced prior to the 1st day of June, A. D. 1869, and the time during which the operation of the provisions of said clause is postponed shall be extended until said 1st day of January, A. D. 1869. And said clause is hereby so amended as to read as follows: in all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st day of January, 1869, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge.

Mr. JENCKES. The committee had this matter under consideration, and were desirous of meeting this subject in the same spirit with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] for the majority of the committee entertained the views entertained by him. But upon examining the great mass of testimony concerning the operations of the law and the necessity of extending the time, they were satisfied it would require a full year, and not six months, as the gentleman proposes, to put this act fairly into operation.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] having yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to offer an amendment, I ask him, as a concession to another interest in this House, to yield to me to propose an amendment, in order that the House may have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. JENCKES. I will hear the amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to move to amend the last clause of section one, by inserting after the words "proceedings in" the word "voluntary;" so that it shall read, "In all proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy," &c.

Mr. JENCKES. I cannot yield for that amendment; this provision is intended to apply to both kinds of proceedings.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. At the time of the passage of this act—and as my colleague [Mr. ELIOT] has called the attention of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] to that fact, I would like to hear the gentleman from Rhode Island further upon it—it was stated that it was necessary to insert a provision to postpone the operation of this portion of the bill for one year from the 1st day of June, 1867, in order to permit the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy by those who, in consequence of the disasters of war and similar circumstances, had become involved, so that there might be a clean bill, or a clean state of things applicable to those who were to avail themselves of this law as a permanent system. And the gentleman well recollects how many times he lost his bill in this House before he consented to the insertion of that provision. When it was inserted it was inserted for that purpose, and that alone. Now, the gentleman proposes to extend that very provision one year longer.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman permit me to say just here that the committee have reported this bill in compliance with petitions from all parts of the United States asking for such a provision?

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that.

Mr. SPALDING. It is not because we wish to change the original contract at all.

Mr. DAWES. I trust that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] have not yielded to "petitions from all parts of the United States" unless they have seen some good reason for complying with the prayer of those petitions. If this provision of the bill is to apply to the permanent system of bankruptcy, and the relief from the fifty per cent. is to apply only to cases in existence before the act went into effect, I desire to know why it is necessary to allow two years for the commencement of proceedings? for, as I understand the bankrupt law at this moment, the benefit of this provision applies to every one who commences his proceedings in bankruptcy before the 1st day of June, 1868. And I do not know why every man who has been involved by the disasters of the past may not commence his proceedings between this time even and the 1st day of June next. A whole year has been allowed for the very purpose of commencing such proceedings; and when a man has once initiated them (and this applies to voluntary as well as involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy) he has the whole benefit of this provision. The effect of the bill is (I do not suppose such is the intention of the committee) to ingraft this provision upon future cases of bankruptcy, and to give those who have become bankrupts since the passage of the law, and in the face of it, the benefit of this provision for a discharge, though they may not be able to pay fifty per cent. of their debts.

It is for us to decide whether it is proper to ingraft upon our permanent system of bankruptcy a provision that a man shall be discharged from his debts, whatever may be the per cent. he may be able to pay; and I would vote upon this provision precisely as if it were to be incorporated in those very terms in a permanent system of bankruptcy. For if you find in a bundle of petitions that may be presented a reason for extending the provision another year it is equivalent to a permanent extension. It is equivalent to ingrafting upon the bankrupt law of the country a provision that a man shall be entitled to discharge from his debts without regard to the amount that he may pay. Hence we are brought to this simple question—and I trust no member will vote upon this bill with any other view—shall we incorporate into the permanent system of bankruptcy in this country a provision that a debtor shall be entitled to his discharge, whether he pay much or whether he pay little?

I suppose, sir, that one object, in framing our system of bankruptcy, was to hold out to an insolvent at the earliest period of his insolvency an inducement to an equal distribution of all his property among his creditors; so that a man, at the first moment he finds himself insolvent, may come forward and say to his creditors, "I am unable to pay my debts; take what I have and give me a discharge." But under the provision here proposed an insolvent will be entitled to his discharge, whether he pays much or little. Thus he will be tempted to go on involving himself more and more and jeopardizing more and more the interests of his creditors. For he himself runs no risk; he is entitled to his discharge at any future period, whatever he may have done with his estate, however he may have squandered it in speculations or unwise business operations; though, when he knew himself insolvent, he may still have gone on increasing his debts, taking advantage of the credit system of the country, and involving his business connections in deeper and deeper indebtedness. There will be no inducement to an early application for the benefits of this law, because a man can always rely on obtaining those benefits just as well in the future as at present.

Mr. JENCKES. I cannot yield further for the discussion of a question that is not properly before the House. I must resume the floor.

It is entirely true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] has stated, that the original bankrupt bill was defeated once or twice because of the opposition of the members from Massachusetts to the bill without this clause in it. And I will say that a similar clause exists in only one bankrupt or insolvent law in the world; and that is the insolvent law of Massachusetts. No such provision exists in the bankrupt law of England or of Scotland or in the bankrupt laws of any of the continental nations of Europe. No such provision was ever incorporated in any bankrupt act in this country, or, so far as I am aware, in the law of any other civilized country.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me for one moment?

Mr. JENCKES. In a moment. I wish the House to understand the point. What I have said explains why the gentleman from Massachusetts is so strenuous for this clause; but agreeing it should be inserted, we now ask that the time in which its operation shall commence shall be extended and nothing more, and we ask that it shall be extended, for the same reason it was extended at the outset. We find those classes of cases still exist. We raise no question of propriety in retaining this section. It is a question of time as to when it shall first take effect, and that alone. Hence I object to the gentleman's arguing the broad question whether such a clause should be in or out of such a statute. It is not before us.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken when he says this was put in at the instance of the Massachusetts delegation. It is true this is copied from the Massachusetts law; and the gentleman will allow me to give him the experience of Massachusetts in reference to this provision.

Mr. JENCKES. I understand that as well as the gentleman himself.

Mr. DAWES. I know the gentleman does.

Mr. JENCKES. Therefore I agreed to the retention of the clause.

Mr. DAWES. Let me state it to the House.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman has stated it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman does not mean to call for the previous question until the matter has been discussed.

Mr. JENCKES. Not until there has been a full and fair discussion.

Mr. DAWES. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I should like to have a few moments.

Mr. JENCKES. How long?

Mr. DAWES. Such time as suits the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour expires at three o'clock.

Mr. JENCKES. I will give the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. DAWES. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, this provision is incorporated from the Massachusetts law, and Massachusetts members have had experience and Massachusetts herself has had experience under this law. The insolvent law of Massachusetts, so largely incorporated in the gentleman's bill, did not originally have this provision in it. It was not until after twenty years' experience of the law that this provision was inserted in it. The effect was this: that the moment a man found himself insolvent, and before he found himself so deeply insolvent that he could not pay fifty cents on the dollar, he said to himself, "I will now distribute my property among my creditors before I sink below the fifty per cent.; and I can then obtain a full discharge without the concurrence of one half of my creditors." The effect was an early distribution of every insolvent's estate. It worked so well in Massachusetts that it saved the insolvent law of Massachusetts from repeal after twenty years' experience of that law which the gentleman from Rhode Island has taken bodily into his bankrupt law.

The insolvent law of Massachusetts is a most perfect system; and, sir, nothing better could be said in support of that law than that the gentleman from Rhode Island has incorporated all or nearly all of its essential provisions in his law. He took the provision in reference to the fifty per cent. from that law, but he suspended its operation for one year. That was time enough to allow those who were deeply involved to take advantage of the law, to commence proceedings and to get a discharge; but the gentleman now proposes to extend it for another year. I submit to the House that the postponement of another year amounts to a postponement entirely of this provision of the bankrupt law. It will act as a great "hopper" through which all fraudulent debtors will go to strip themselves of their obligations. If you desire to have a healthy system of bankruptcy, one which will secure the most to the creditors and relieve the honest debtor from the first moment he becomes convinced of his insolvent condition—which is the only honest basis upon which a bankrupt law can rest—you must hold out to him the inducement to distribute his property immediately, for it goes upon the principle, and it can rest upon no other principle than that, that it is fraudulent for a man to continue to contract debts after he knows that he is unable to pay them in full.

I desire, therefore, to test the sense of the House by moving to strike out the first section of the bill, if the gentleman will permit me to do so, because it is nothing more nor less than an attempt to place this bankrupt law upon such a basis that a man can fraudulently go to the extent of the patience of his creditors into bankruptcy and into speculation and ruin, carrying down not only himself but his trusting creditors, and then avail himself of the provisions of this law with all the benefits which he would have if he was compelled by it to go into bankruptcy and distribute his property the moment he found himself unable to pay his debts. You cannot maintain your law on any such system as that. If the gentleman from Rhode Island cares to know what has been the experience of the only State in this Union that has had a bankrupt law for twenty years, I assure him that we could not have maintained our law in Massachusetts without this provision, compelling insolvents in our State to go into bankruptcy and distribute their property, and cease to attempt the fraud of contracting new debts after they have found they were unable to pay them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island yield to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to move to strike out the first section of the bill?

Mr. JENCKES. No, sir; I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me for two minutes?

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, few members of this House were in favor of the provision which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] so eloquently advocates here to-day—the provision that the debtor should be stripped by compulsory bankruptcy of all his estate and yet not be discharged of his debts unless his estate should pay fifty per cent. I know very well that there were many members in this House opposed to the enactment of the bankrupt law on any terms. There was also a large section of the House in favor of it without this objectionable feature which the gentleman from Massachusetts so earnestly defends. These opposing parties were almost equally balanced. It happened that the gentleman and his friends held the balance of power, and thus a very few members of the House were able to say "unless you incorporate this feature into the bill it shall not become a law." But there never was a day when there was half of the House, or one third of the House, or, I think I may say, even one fourth of the House, in favor of the proposition upon which the gentleman now so zealously insists.

Sir, the whole principle of involuntary bankruptcy involved in this bill is, and always has been, most distasteful to a large portion of the people of the West. We were satisfied with, and in favor of, the voluntary provisions of this act for the most part, but we had, and we have to-day, in all the western States abundant machinery provided by our own local laws for the accomplishment of all the objects secured by this law, so far as its provisions for involuntary bankruptcy are concerned; and we could never have been reconciled to this legislation unless this clause had been incorporated in it which postponed for one year the taking effect of that provision under which a debtor dragged into involuntary bankruptcy could be deprived of all his property, and yet if he did not pay fifty per cent. of his debts could have no discharge.

Sir, the gentleman's arguments are all aimed against the postponement of the taking effect of the fifty per cent. provision in cases of voluntary bankruptcy. They have no weight as against such postponement in cases of involuntary bankruptcy. The gentleman says it would be all wrong to permit a voluntary bankrupt to receive a complete discharge at the close of a mad career of speculation without paying half of his debts. But, sir, how is it with the involuntary bankrupt who is struggling to pay his debts, and has estate enough to pay them, if left in his own hands, to be carefully and prudently used, but, if dragged into bankruptcy and sold out under the hammer, has not enough to pay fifty per cent., and therefore becomes involved in hopeless ruin?

Now, we say that in case of involuntary bankruptcy, where the debtor is compelled against his will to go into court and surrender all his property, he should be allowed to go free, and that this privilege should continue not merely for one or two years, but forever. We are in favor of striking from this law entirely the provision which declares that a debtor shall not go acquit unless he pays fifty per cent. of his debts in all cases of compulsory bankruptcy. Make what rule you will for those who voluntarily become bankrupts. But if the debtor shall be stripped of all his estate by his creditors let him stand discharged of all his debts by the law.

We are unwilling that this provision should permanently stand in this law. And I now give notice that at no distant day the attempt will be made to transform this postponement of the provision into its absolute repeal, and to provide that every debtor who shall be stripped of all his estate by proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy shall at the same time be discharged of all his debts.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has considered a bill which was presented to him some time ago in regard to the construction of the thirty-ninth section of this act? The district courts of Pennsylvania have decided that in the case of a creditor filing his petition declaring a debtor bankrupt, under this act of Congress the onus of proof was thrown entirely upon the debtor. That certainly was not the intention of Congress when this act was passed; we did not then suppose that such a construction would be placed upon it. And I ask the gentleman, in amending that act, to see that that provision be so altered that the onus shall be thrown upon the petitioner.

Mr. JENCKES. I know it was stated that there was a decision of that kind made by one of the courts of Pennsylvania. But it was an erroneous decision, and has not been followed or sustained by any other court in the United States.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that that decision of the court of the western district of Pennsylvania has been concurred in by Judge Grier.

Mr. JENCKES. I know such a statement was published, but I have ascertained upon inquiry that such was not the fact. And in other circuits where the question has been presented it has been decided differently. I do not think it is necessary for Congress to undertake to correct the erroneous decision of a single district court judge.

Mr. MILLER. That is held to be the law in Pennsylvania. And I understand that the district judge consulted Judge Grier, who sat with him, and that Judge Grier concurred with him.

Mr. JENCKES. I think if the gentleman will inquire a little further in regard to that case, he will find that there is no necessity for amending the law for the purpose of rectifying that error. If it has not been corrected already, it soon will be.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to offer an amendment for that purpose?

Mr. JENCKES. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the first section of this bill, and ask his consent to offer an amendment to the effect that the proposed extension of time from the 1st of June, 1868, to the 1st of June, 1869, shall not inure to the benefit of debtors, so far as regards debts contracted subsequently to the passage of the original bill.

I am satisfied that at least in some portions of the country a condition of things has prevailed and still prevails which will enable debtors to avail themselves very largely of the benefit of this law prior to the 1st of June next; and that so far as they are concerned it is right to extend the time possibly as long as this provision extends it. But it does seem to me that the original policy of the act, requiring voluntary bankrupts to pay at least fifty cents on the dollar before they should be discharged, ought to be retained so far as regards indebtedness that has been incurred since the passage of that act. And if the gentleman will allow me, I will move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JENCKES. I cannot yield for that amendment, and for this reason: the suggestion was presented to the committee and considered by them. But we have doubts whether with such an amendment the law would be uniform; and it must be uniform in all cases. And if there should possibly be in the course of a year one case of hardship out of ten thousand cases we must submit to the smaller evil for the sake of the greater good.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the original bankrupt bill was passed in this House with very great difficulty, its fate being for a long time doubtful. The vote, if I recollect aright, was at first 70 to 70; and then, I believe, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] changed his vote making the vote 71 to 69. Twenty-five years ago we had a bankrupt law which after a short experiment proved to be highly unsatisfactory; and the cause of complaint was this very voluntary feature. If the gentleman wishes to retain this bankrupt act a part of the commercial law of the land I suggest to him that he should not press this feature to too great an extent.

Mr. JENCKES. I might agree with the gentleman if what he suggests had not been considered and determined against as contrary to the principle upon which the act is founded.

Mr. PIKE. I would like to make one observation with the consent of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the House will allow the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to offer his amendment. I voted for the original bill with great reluctance; and one of the considerations that induced me to vote for it was that debtors were to have the unlimited benefits of the act for but a single year. With some reluctance I consented that these benefits should be extended for one year without limitation; but I am not willing that the time shall be further extended. I hope the gentleman from Rhode Island will allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer his amendment, so that the House may determine this question, whether or not a creditor has anything to do with the estate of a debtor. It must be well understood that under our present bankrupt law, as under that law of 1842, so long as there is no conservative provision that either the consent of creditors or the payment of a certain percentage of debts shall be necessary in order to the discharge of a debtor, the creditor practically has nothing whatever to do either with the property or the discharge of the debtor, the matter depending almost wholly upon the affidavit of the debtor, who goes in and acquits himself of his debts without regard to the wishes of the creditor.

Mr. JENCKES. I believe I must resume the floor.

Mr. ARNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JENCKES. I will hear it.

Mr. ARNELL. Will not the gentleman permit me to offer the amendment I indicated sometime ago in regard to publication of notice?

Mr. JENCKES. I will state for the information of the gentleman that that matter has been considered by the committee and also by the courts. It is a matter relating to process, and is entirely within the control of the courts. I understand from the justices of the Supreme Court that it is a matter of which they can and will take care. Therefore there is no need of inserting in the act any provision on the subject.

I wish now to reply, in a very few words, to the remarks which have been made by several gentlemen in regard to this bill. It is true, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has said, that the original bill was passed with very grave doubts in the minds of many as to its success; but I think I can say, from testimony that has been presented to the committee and the House, that those doubts have been overcome in every part of the country. No one has been able to mention here any case in which there has been any hardship upon any creditor, or in which any creditor has not received his just and proportionate share of the estate of the debtor; and there has been no case presented where a fraudulent debtor has obtained a release from any court. Such cases have not occurred under this law.

Let me, then, state the reason why this further extension is asked. No person, under the present law, can go into a court of the United States and obtain a discharge from his indebtedness unless he makes a full and free exhibition of the whole of his affairs, not only of their condition at the time he goes into court, but during the whole period in which he has transacted business. Hence many persons are deterred from applying for the benefit of this act; and thus there have been hundreds and thousands of settlements, compromises between debtors and creditors; so that the time of the courts has not been occupied by such cases.

I would state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that whenever a proposition shall be made here to strike out this clause altogether, then his argument and that of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] may be pertinent to such an issue. But no such proposition is now made. The arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts in the last Congress prevailed with the committee and with the House, and this clause was inserted. The practical administration of this law has satisfied the committee of the propriety of still further postponing the operation of this clause.

We meet now precisely as we did then, agreeing on the one hand as to the propriety of the clause, but on the other contending that its operation should be further postponed for a period. Why? Because we find still existing the causes which justified the postponement of its operation in the first instance. It is reported to us from all parts of the country that there are hundreds of persons desirous to take the benefits of this law but too poor to raise the fifty dollars required to be deposited for the fees of the register and other officers of the court. Many are waiting till the time when they shall have accumulated a sum sufficient to make the necessary deposit and to pay the expenses as the proceedings go on. In the southern country there are thousands of such cases. One register writes that three hundred applications for the benefits of the law have been made in his district, and that there would be three hundred more if the parties could raise the fifty dollars to pay the expenses. From Tennessee the report of the registers is to the same effect. I have received some recently. They ask for this delay, and for this very reason that they are unable to pay the fifty dollars. And in some districts the judges require the deposit of an additional fifty dollars to pay the expenses of the marshal and clerk. There the debtor has to deposit $100 before his petition can be received.

If the man could come into court without this deposit and at once file his petition there would be no reason for delay. He has not only to prepare his petition and schedule, but he has also to deposit this money at the same time. That requires not only time for preparation, but present means. He must satisfy the marshal and clerk and also his counsel before his petition can be received. This is one reason for the delay, and I submit to the House that it is a good one.

But there is another and a greater reason growing out of the introduction of this section in the Massachusetts law itself. It is true it is to be found in that law, but in no other law in the world except that of Massachusetts; and Massachusetts did not attempt to incorporate it into her law until after, as the gentleman says, twenty years' experience. Twenty years were required in Massachusetts of experience in reference to her insolvent law before that active commercial community consented to its insertion. Previous to that an absolute discharge was given to the debtor from his home debts without this requirement. Now, I ask the gentleman and this House whether a statute applicable to this whole country, and not confined alone to a single State, should be put into effect more speedily than one relating to the business of a single compact commercial community? When it required twenty years' experience before this provision was incorporated into the insolvent law of a State it is not to be expected that it should be put more speedily into effect under a law that has application to the whole country.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield to a question only.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Rhode Island mistakes the reason why the State of Massachusetts put this into her insolvent law after ten years' experience. She did not wait to be educated up to that point. She started off with the idea that the gentleman from Rhode Island has, that the insolvent law of Massachusetts could stand without such a provision.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not yield to an argument. We have heard this argument often enough. The House has heard it. We all understand it.

The gentleman argues as if the proposition of the committee was to strike out this provision from the law. That is not the proposition of the committee. I say that this provision is made applicable to the whole country, and not to Massachusetts alone. It is not made applicable to a single compact commercial community, but to the whole country and to States and communities where business is carried on differently from what it is in Massachusetts. When it goes into effect the whole business of the country will have to conform to it. And it is for that reason, and that alone, if not for the other reasons I have stated, that the operation of the provision is asked to be extended for a longer period. We agree that the country can be, and ought to be, educated up to the Massachusetts standard in this respect, but when he admits that Massachusetts herself was not educated up to this point in twenty years he should consent to give the rest of the country at least twenty months.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island whether this will not enable men to take the benefit of the law more cheaply than can now be done by enabling the judges to take proof?

Mr. JENCKES. Judges of the court now have power to take proof; but the statutes of the United States punishing perjury are not applicable to proof of debt taken before State officers. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that the demand for the previous question will not be seconded until I can move my amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JENCKES and Mr. DAWES were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 28.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The question then recurred on Mr. Eliot's amendment.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 370, to prevent the further sale of the public lands of the United States except as provided for in the preemption and homestead laws, and the laws for disposing of town sites and mineral lands; upon which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Driggs] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. DRIGGS. I would inquire of the Chair when the bill would be again reached if I yield now to a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It will come up again after the next morning hour, subject, however, to the contingency of being superseded by the Committee of Elections calling up a contested-election case, of which there are several, or a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on a tax bill or an appropriation bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to give notice to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Driggs] and to the House that upon the first opportunity that may be offered I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole upon the appropriation bills.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire also to give notice that the minority of the Committee on Appropriations will ask leave to file a report embodying their views upon the appropriation bills referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Spalding.]

Mr. DRIGGS. I do not desire to go on this afternoon, as the House is not very full; and therefore I will yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Also, the petition of W. H. Johnson, asking for increase of pension.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of Richard Stockdale, late private of company A, third regiment Iowa volunteers, praying Congress to cause, by law, an honorable discharge to be made in his case.

Also, a memorial in favor of the passage of a bill granting a charter for an air-line railroad between Washington and New York, signed by DeGrasse Livingston, James Brown, and 100 others, capitalists of New York.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. R. H. NEALE, D. D., of Boston, Massachusetts.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock and twenty five minutes p. m., when,

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. KOONTZ and Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, for two weeks, and to Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, for one week.

SURVEYS OF THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to move that the communication of the Secretary of War of the 26th instant, together with the accompanying report of the examination and surveys of the Tennessee river, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. EGGLESTON, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 594) to take possession of the bar known as Pass à l'Outre, at the entrance of the Mississippi river, and construct a canal without any expense to the Government; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

DISPOSITION OF CAPTURED VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a list of the vessels and property captured or destroyed by the Navy of the United States from April 15, 1861, to April 20, 1865, with the disposition made of each capture, the names of the vessels interested, and the cause of delay in the payment of the prize-money to the parties in accordance with existing laws.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to modify his resolution so as to extend the inquiry to all vessels captured during the war.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have no objection to that. I modify the resolution by substituting "during the war" for the words "from April 15, 1861, to April 20, 1865."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to permit another amendment: to ask the Secretary of the Navy the reason why he has not answered a resolution of the House of the 6th of January in regard to the purchase and sale of vessels.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have no objection to that inquiry; but I think it had better not be included in this resolution, which refers merely to the vessels captured during the war and the distribution of the prize-money. The object is that the many men who are waiting for these small sums of money may know why they are not forthcoming.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

NOTICE OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to avail myself of a proper opportunity to call the attention of the House, either as a privileged question or in some other form, to the official report of the impeachment proceedings with reference to the connection of some of the managers with the Alta Vela affair; and I should like to do it to-day after the Senate has adjourned.

The SPEAKER. That matter cannot be considered at this time, as no business can be entertained except by unanimous consent, and nothing that will occupy any time. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] as the Chair understands, gives notice that business may be expected this afternoon after the return of the House to the Hall.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to give notice that after the return of the House from the Senate this afternoon I shall ask the House to consider the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill. I will say further that I presume no questions of any particular interest will arise, as the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence with most of the amendments of the Senate, which are in the line of economy, and recommend non-concurrence in two or three others, which will probably go to a committee of conference.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report in writing on the subject of artificial limbs for soldiers; which was recommended to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock m.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. FERRISS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing "Townsend's Historical Record and Encyclopedia of the Rebellion," now in the Library for inspection and examination.

CONDUCT OF IMPEACHMENT MANAGERS.

Mr. BROOKS. I hold in my hand a resolution which I wish, as I stated this morning, to submit to the consideration of the House, having reference to certain official proceedings before the high court of impeachment in the other end of the Capitol. It appears from these proceedings that the Managers appointed on the part of this House—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand what question the gentleman rises to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York must state what he desires to bring before the House in the shape in which the House can act upon it.

Mr. BROOKS. I am stating it as briefly as possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must state it in writing in a manner in which it can be acted on. A speech cannot be acted on.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I will offer a resolution, which I will read myself.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen on the left insist that the rules be observed. The gentleman must ask unanimous consent to make a speech, or else present something that the House can act upon.

Mr. BROOKS. I then offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it appears by the official reports of the high court of impeachment that after the House of Rep-representatives, on the 24th of February, voted the impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors, and after the articles of impeachment were laid before the Senate March 2, and after the summons served upon the President, March 7, some of the managers selected by the House to demand the conviction and eviction of that President for these high crimes and misdemeanors signed a letter laid before the accused, counseling or influencing him, while thus accused, to exert the war powers given him under the act of August, 1856, through the Navy, to seize the guano island, Alta Vela, off the coast of St. Domingo, valued at over a million dollars; and whereas such action upon the part of our managers is, to say the least, extraordinary and of a character to involve them in controversy, if not in suspicion; and whereas it is of high importance that the dignity and purity of this House be maintained through the managers chosen from among us, especially to represent us before the high court, and there to accuse the President of these high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the aforesaid managers be directed forthwith to appear before the House and to explain to that House the causes or reasons which induced some of them, pending a trial threatening the deposition of the President, to sign such a letter thus laid before that President.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is that offered as a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman submits it as a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the Chair hold that it is a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the managers, representing the House of Representatives as they do, must be under the control of the House in regard to their action at the bar of the Senate; and he, therefore, thinks it would be in the power of the House at any time to require them to answer any allegations touching their official relations to the Senate or to the case.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the Chair regards it as a question of privilege—

The SPEAKER. Such was the decision upon an analogous question in the Warren Hastings case.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As none of the managers are now present, I presume the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] will not press the resolution at this time. If he does I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. BROOKS. I certainly am not disposed to press it now, if the managers are not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] objects to the consideration of the resolution, and the question will be whether the House will now consider it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from New York does not propose to press the consideration of the resolution now.

Mr. BROOKS. To what time does the gentleman from Illinois propose the resolution shall go over?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I make no proposition myself at all. I have no control over the question whatever. I presume the gentleman from New York does not intend to press a matter of this kind during the absence of the managers, and when they are engaged in the performance of the duties we have devolved upon them in the Senate.

Mr. BROOKS. I gave notice of the resolution this morning, so that the managers might hear what I contemplated doing. I made the notice a matter of record in order to bring it to their special attention. I am surprised that none of them are here after such a notice publicly given.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York insists upon the consideration of the resolution at the present time, the Chair will put the question to the House whether it will or will not consider the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I must insist upon it, unless some definite understanding can be had as to when the resolution shall come up.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the consideration of the resolution, and, as this is a matter relating to the priority of business, the question is, Will the House consider the resolution now?

Mr. BROOKS. For information, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he will not suggest some time for the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I certainly cannot. I made the objection to the consideration of the resolution now because the managers are not here, being engaged in the performance of the duties assigned them in the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he does not think that when such charges are afloat before the public the managers ought to have an opportunity to explain in person before the House their action?

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, debate is not in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois, as I understand, has objected to the consideration of the resolution on the ground that the managers are not present. I discover that one or two of them are now in the House.

The SPEAKER. That is certainly not a question of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood that to be the ground of the gentleman's objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] objects, as he has a right to do, to debate; and no debate is in order.

Mr. BROOKS. Then we are to understand that this thing is to die here, and that the managers will not appear and answer.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 28, nays 52, not voting 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Cary, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Johnson, Jones, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Stone, Taber, Van Trump, and Woodward—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Blair, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eggleston, Elia, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketchum, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pile, Price, Robertson, Schenck, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Henry D. Washburn—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Burr, Butler, Cake, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Glessbrenner, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Ashbel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladlin, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCullough, Mercur, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Mungen, Newcomb, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Peters, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Raum, Sawyer, Seefeld, Selye, Shanks, Shelabarger, Sigreaves, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—109.

The SPEAKER. On this question no quorum has voted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, stated that his colleague, Mr. COVEX, was detained at his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to inquire what condition this matter will be in if the House now adjourns?

Mr. BROOKS. What becomes of my resolution?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Did the Chair say that the question before the House was whether the House will now proceed to consider the resolution?

The SPEAKER. That is the question. No quorum having voted, it will remain before the House until disposed of, and no other business can be transacted except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. There is one question of privilege now before the House, and there cannot be two at the same time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that he withdraw his resolution for the present. It will be in the same position to-morrow as it is to-day. He can offer it again when the House shall return from the Senate Chamber to-morrow. The managers will have full notice by the offering of the resolution to-day, and there will undoubtedly be a quorum here at that time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York adopts that suggestion, the Chair will give notice this evening so that it will appear in the papers to-morrow, that this matter will come up on the return of the House from the Senate Chamber to-morrow.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not understand in what condition the Chair decided the resolution to be.

The SPEAKER. It is in the condition of unfinished business; but the Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that if he withdraws the resolution now, the gentleman from Illinois desiring to take up public business, the Chair will give notice to-night that business will be transacted to-morrow, and that this resolution will be offered which will probably bring a quorum here.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not desire to interrupt the Speaker, but I understood the question to be a different one from the one the Chair decided that the House voted on. I supposed that a question of privilege came before the House unless the House determined otherwise, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] moved that it be not now considered. I supposed that to be the question instead of whether the House would now consider it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule from page 71 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker. And it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report, even though a question of privilege is involved in the report. But after a question has been stated and its discussion commenced it is too late to raise the question of consideration."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois raised the question of consideration.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I thought the question was different. I do not know but the ruling of the Chair is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me understand the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My suggestion is that the gentleman withdraw his resolution now, as he will lose nothing by it, and he can offer it again to-morrow if he desires to do so.

Mr. BROOKS. It may be impossible for me to get the floor again to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I take it, that by unanimous consent, or by general understanding, the gentleman can be recognized to-morrow as he was to-day.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York credits the statements of the Chair, the Chair stated that in order that the public business might not be interrupted now he would give notice this evening that on the return of the House from the Senate Chamber to-morrow the gentleman from New York would introduce the question of privilege on which no quorum voted. It will then be subject to the rules of the House, as it is to-day.

Mr. BROOKS. With that understanding I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to do business without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know; that depends on the House itself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is shown that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MAYNARD. Inasmuch as the Journal demonstrates that there is no quorum present, can we do any business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by the withdrawal of the resolution of the gentleman from New York the proceedings on it have virtually fallen, and, therefore, the House can proceed to other business, although a single member can object by demanding a division if there is no quorum present. But there might possibly be a quorum present now.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill. I ask the House to consider them now, as they will take but a short time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object. The gentleman objected the other day to the consideration of the privileged question which I presented.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee on Appropriations has the right to report at any time. So the gentleman's objection does not avail.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations is authorized to report at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I raise the same point that the gentleman raised on me the other day. I object to the consideration of the subject.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Before that question is put, I desire to withdraw the report.

Mr. ROBINSON. Although it was ungentlemanly in the gentleman to object the other day to the consideration of my resolution I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] having withdrawn his objection, I trust my colleague [Mr. ROSS] will withdraw his motion to adjourn, and permit this matter to be acted on now.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; I object to transacting business without a quorum.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, as there is no quorum present, I will not press the matter.

The motion of Mr. ROSS was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ELA: The petition of Captain James Davidson, for pension as a captain, or to be allowed to retire on the same allowance expended on those at the Military Asylum. Captain Davidson has been forty-five years in the service; twenty-eight as ordnance sergeant, and while so acting was commissioned as captain, to take command of all State troops sent to Fort Constitution by arrangement with Secretary of War, and subsequently authorized to raise a company, and while acting in this capacity was disabled in the line of his duty.

Also, the petition of George W. Nesmith and others, for a pension for Prescott Y. Howland, who was accidentally wounded while target shooting.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of 154 citizens of Grant county, Indiana, praying Congress to postpone the sale of the Osage Indian lands in the State of Kansas.

Also, a memorial of Hon. Robert A. Hill, judge of the United States district court of Mississippi, and others, praying an increase of compensation for the clerk of said court.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition from citizens of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, praying for the creation of a new post office in said city.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Mary A. Perkins, widow of John Perkins, deceased, late company C, seventy-first Pennsylvania volunteers, for arrears of pension.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of Jacob Levit, of Milwaukee, for an additional bounty of fifty dollars.

IN SENATE.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock and five minutes, when,

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 1, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

NOTICE OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] gave notice yesterday afternoon that he would offer a resolution to-day on the return of the House from the Senate Chamber. Business will, therefore, be transacted this afternoon, and gentlemen who desire to refer bills will postpone such matters until that time.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and ten minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock m.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted for two weeks to Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, and for an indefinite time to Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, asking an appropriation to aid in the repairs of the Smithsonian building, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WHISKY SEIZURES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the quantity of whisky seized in New York and Brooklyn, &c., in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 6th of January; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] gave notice of his intention to offer to-day the resolution which he offered yesterday, and on which no quorum voted. The gentleman from New York is not now in his seat.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York is not here, and I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill. I hope the House will agree to consider them.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, then, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869.

First amendment:

On page 1, line five, strike out the words "million of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "million."

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Lines five and six strike out the words "required by existing law" and insert in lieu thereof the word "necessary."

The committee recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Strike out the proviso commencing on line six and ending on line thirteen, as follows:

Provided, That all moneys now under the control or subject to the order of the Secretary of the Navy, whether arising from appropriations or from sales of public property or otherwise, which shall be expended on the 1st day of July, 1868, shall be covered the into Treasury; so that no amount hereby appropriated shall be expended or drawn while any other unexpended moneys shall be subject to the order of the Secretary of the Navy.

The committee recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

In line sixteen, before the word "tools," insert "labor in navy-yards;" so that it will read:

For preservation of wood and iron vessels and ships in ordinary, and for those that are on stocks, vessels for the Naval Academy, for purchase of material and stores of all kinds, labor in navy-yards, tools, transportation of material, repair of vessels, &c.

The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to make an inquiry for information in regard to the use of tools in navy-yards. Is there any restriction in this bill upon converting the laborers in navy-yards into political tools?

The SPEAKER. That is not embraced in this amendment. The two Houses have concurred in regard to the word "tools."

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

On page 2, line nine, strike out the word "tools" and insert "tools."

The committee recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

In line nine, page 2, after the word "ferriages" insert "for coal and other fuel."

The committee recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

On page 3, line ten, after the word "necessary" insert "repairs of."

The committee recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

On pages 3 and 4 strike out the following proviso: Provided, That the civil engineer and naval store-keeper at the several navy-yards, and that all persons employed at the several navy-yards, and superintendents of mechanical departments heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master masons, master boatbuilders, master sparmakers, master blockmakers, and the superintendents of rope-walks, shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the House will not concur in that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This proviso is precisely like a provision in the existing law.

Mr. BANKS. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois] is utterly mistaken in that respect. The provision of the existing law is a proviso to an appropriation bill, and expires with that bill. If it is the intention of the committee that this provision shall remain operative as a part of the law, it is indispensable that it should be incorporated in this bill.

This proviso was adopted by an almost unanimous vote of the House. It touches one of the subjects most interesting and most important to the people. I am sure the two Houses will concur in some regulation upon this subject, if they properly consider it. I hope, therefore, the committee will allow this proviso to stand as a part of this bill. I am convinced in my own mind—though the idea occurs to me suddenly, but I may be in error—I am convinced in my own mind that the proviso inserted in the appropriation bill of last year, upon my own motion, is a condition attached to that appropriation, and is exhausted with the expenditure of the appropriation.

But, at any rate, I may be allowed to say that the Secretary of the Navy has deliberately disregarded that provision; he has set it aside. And some action or some legislation ought to be taken upon this subject in that view. If this action be not necessary to maintain the original condition in the bill of last year I would be glad to hear the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations upon this subject, showing that it is a part of the existing law. If it be so, of course I will not ask that it be repeated in this bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. With the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] in regard to what he has said. We wish to understand what change is proposed to be made in the existing law. If the proviso now in the bill should be stricken out, how will the matter then stand; how will these officers or these workmen be appointed?

Mr. BANKS. If the proviso now in the bill, and which the Senate proposes to strike out, be retained, these men will be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, unless some change shall be made in the law on this subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed that, under the existing law, they were appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. That was my impression.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; they will be appointed by the President. Whatever the Secretary of the Navy does is supposed to be done with the concurrence of the President.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But the gentleman will, if he pleases, answer the question I have suggested—how will the law stand if the proviso be stricken out? What will then be law? How will these men then be appointed?

Mr. BANKS. These places, Mr. Speaker, will be filled by warrant officers of the Navy. I make no question as to who shall appoint these men, if they be practical mechanics and men from civil life. My objection is to filling up the workshops of this country, so far as the Government can control them, with warrant officers of the Navy. Men wearing uniforms and shoulder straps, knowing nothing of the business they are to supervise, are appointed by the Government of the United States to control the mechanics of this country. If it be merely a question whether they shall be appointed by the President or by the Secretary of the Navy I have not a word to say. I am quite willing that the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint them, if he will; but he will not. Therefore the proposition was made by the House that the President should be directed to appoint these men from civil life, and that they should be men skilled in the trades which they are appointed to supervise. If I have answered the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] I will not trespass further upon the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say, I presume, that there was no division of opinion as to the merits of this proviso. I raised the question, the gentleman will recollect, when this bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, and the ground I took then was that the proviso was entirely unnecessary, because the existing law contains such a provision. It was deemed unnecessary to reenact that provision, although the Secretary of the Navy may have refused, and probably has refused, to execute it, as he has refused to do a great many other things which he ought to have done. I will ask the Clerk to read, in the first place, the proviso which the Senate proposes to strike out, and afterward the provision of the existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the civil engineer and naval storekeeper at the several navy-yards and the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sail-makers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boatbuilders, master sparmakers, master blockmakers, and the superintendents of the rope-walks, shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now ask the Clerk to read the provision of the act of March 2, 1867.

The Clerk read as follows:

"For pay of superintendents and the civil establishment at the several navy-yards and stations under the control of the Bureau of Yards and Docks and at the Naval Asylum, $153,967: Provided, That the civil engineer and naval storekeeper, when required at any of the navy-yards, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the persons employed at the several navy-yards as master machinists, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sail-makers, master plumbers, master painters, and master calkers, shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life."

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, my apprehension is that this proviso may be construed as a condition appended to the appropriation made in that section, and that it is not in such language as is necessary to constitute a permanent law of the land. If I am in error in this—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am willing that the House shall non-concur in this amendment, and that this matter should be considered by a committee of conference.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that may be done.

The committee recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now desire the House to consider the amendment in regard to the Naval Laboratory and allow it to stand as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of line fifteen, as follows:
For Naval Laboratory $20,000.

The SPEAKER. The Senate proposes to strike this out. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence. If there be no objection, the vote will be again taken on concurring.

Mr. WARD and Mr. ROSS objected.

The SPEAKER. Then the question will be on the motion to reconsider. The Chair, to save one vote, suggested that the question should be taken directly on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I can explain this matter in one moment. The Senate proposes to strike out this item, but at the same time, in the next amendment, proposes an increase of the appropriation from $32,000 to $60,000. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in both these amendments, thereby reducing the amount appropriated about thirty thousand dollars. I ask the Clerk to read the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Twenty-fourth amendment:

Strike out line fifteen, as follows:

For Naval Laboratory, $20,000.

Twenty-fifth amendment:

In line seventeen strike out "thirty-two" and insert "sixty;" so that the clause will read:

For pay of the civil establishment under this bureau at the several naval hospitals and navy-yards, $60,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The committee propose that the House shall non-concur in both these amendments, that we may have some explanation from the Senate.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This laboratory is, as I understand, a scientific department, absolutely necessary to the conduct of naval matters. Do I understand the gentleman to state that the Committee on Appropriations are without any information in regard to the importance of this laboratory?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Committee on Appropriations had such information in regard to it that they inserted in the bill an appropriation of $20,000 for the laboratory. The Senate has stricken that out, but has added in the next appropriation an amendment changing the amount from $32,000 to $60,000. We propose that the House non-concur in both these amendments, and let them go to a committee of conference.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman explain why he connects the laboratory, a scientific department of our naval establishment, with these hospitals? What object has he in making that connection, which appears not to be reasonable or logical. Why should a laboratory go under because too much money has been appropriated to a hospital?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not say there was any necessary connection between them. The reason the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in the amendment striking out the item of $20,000 for a Naval Laboratory was that they believed the appropriation necessary to support that laboratory. The Senate has stricken out that appropriation, and hence we recommend non-concurrence. In the other amendment the Senator has added some thirty thousand dollars to what the House proposed to appropriate. We recommend non-concurrence in that also.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question then recurred on concurring in the twenty-fourth amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the votes on these various amendments; and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move the appointment of a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

CONDUCT OF IMPEACHMENT MANAGERS.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, from the vote taken in the House yesterday, which I regret to say was altogether a party vote, I have drawn the inference that on the other side of the House there was objection to my resolution. In resubmitting the proposition, therefore, I have varied the form of the resolution while retaining the preamble as originally offered. I submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it appears by the official reports of the high court of impeachment that after the House of Representatives, on the 24th of February, voted the impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors, and after the articles of impeachment were laid before the Senate, March 2, and after the summons served upon the President, March 7, some of the managers selected by the House to demand the conviction and eviction of that President for these high crimes and misdemeanors signed a letter laid before the accused, counseling or influencing him, while thus accused, to exert the war powers given him under the act of August, 1856, through the Navy, to seize the guano island, Alta Vela, off the coast of St. Domingo, valued at over a million dollars; and whereas such action upon the part of our managers is, to say the least, extraordinary and of a character to involve them in controversy, if not in suspicion; and whereas it is of high importance that the dignity and purity of this House be maintained through the managers chosen from among us, especially to represent us before the high court, and there to accuse the President of these high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to investigate all the facts of this case, and that said committee be directed to make the earliest possible report to this House, with such recommendations as the facts warrant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a question of privilege, as the rulings have been uniform that questions touching the official conduct of officers of the House are questions of privilege. The managers representing the House, of course, are subject to the orders of the House. It is, however, under the rules of the House, subject to the rule which is well known to members on both sides of the House as to whether the House will consider it. If no objection is made to its consideration at the present time it is before the House. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting the following:

That consent is given to the managers and any other members of the House to be heard on any question of personal explanation connected with the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson.

I submit to the gentleman from New York that before he introduces a resolution of the character which he has indicated this resolution should be passed. It is substantially what he offered himself yesterday.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. BROOKS. The majority on the other side voted down that resolution by a party vote, and I therefore prefer to offer this resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It was not voted down, nor did we refuse to consider it from any hostility to the consideration of the subject. We did not receive it for the reason that none of the managers were present.

Mr. BROOKS. There was one manager present yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. But one or two.

A MEMBER. There were three here.

Mr. BROOKS. There were three of them, I am told, present yesterday, but the House refused to entertain the resolution, and, under the circumstances, I thought it better to move for a select committee. This resolution does not exclude the managers from making any personal explanation. When they desire it they will have the floor and may enter into the debate, and we shall hear all they have to say upon the subject.

Mr. Speaker, the reasons which have induced me to offer the resolution are set forth in part in the preamble, but the letter of March 9 referred to in that preamble is not set forth or yet entered on the Journal of the House, and, therefore, I propose to read that letter.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from New York to introduce a resolution to have a committee of which, according to all parliamentary usage, he is to be the chairman. It is to be a quasi judicial investigation. I desire to know whether the gentleman proposes to forestall the case which he is going to examine by a preliminary speech here?

Mr. BROOKS. I propose only to state the facts and give an opportunity to the managers to reply to those facts. I propose to state the grounds only.

I was about to read the letter of March 9, submitted to and laid before the President of the United States on that day, addressed to Colonel J. W. Shaffer, counsel in the Alta Vela case. That letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 9, 1868.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your question relating to the validity of the claim of the United States to the jurisdiction over the island of Alta Vela, upon considerable consideration of the subject I am clearly of opinion that under the claim of the United States its citizens have the exclusive right to take guano there. This is clearly indisputable both by the law of nations and by our municipal laws.

I have never been able to understand why the Executive did not long since assert the rights of the Government and sustain the rightful claims of its citizens to the possession of the island in the most forcible manner consistent with the dignity and honor of the nation.

I am, yours, truly, BENJAMIN F. BUTLER.
Col. J. W. SHAFFER, Washington, D. C.

That is signed by Mr. BUTLER, one of the managers of the impeachment. On that letter follows this:

I concur in the opinion above expressed by General BUTLER.
JOHN A. LOGAN.
And I. J. A. GARFIELD.

This letter, with these three names, and these three only, was first laid before the President of the United States, and subsequently an exact copy of this letter, with the exact date, March 9, was, on March 16, laid before the President of the United States by the counsel in this case, and to those names were added the following:

I concur.
W. H. KOONTZ,
J. K. MOORHEAD,
THADDEUS STEVENS,
J. G. BLAINE,
JOHN A. BINGHAM.

This makes in all four of the seven managers, a majority, who are appointed to conduct the impeachment on the part of this House. This letter was addressed to the counsel in the Alta Vela case, and laid before the President March 16.

Mr. BUTLER. Where do you find the address to the President?

Mr. BROOKS. This letter was addressed to Colonel Shaffer, the aide-de-camp of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] during the last war; his friend and counsel; his "particular friend," as he states in some remarks which he made in the Senate. And this letter was laid before the President of the United States by another counsel, Chauncey F. Black, a copy of which, dated March 16, I have in my hands, with the following address:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have heretofore handed you a letter expressing the opinions of Generals BUTLER, LOGAN, and GARFIELD in respect to our claims to Alta Vela. Please find herewith a copy of the same, with the concurrence of THADDEUS STEVENS, JOHN A. BINGHAM, J. G. BLAINE, J. K. MOORHEAD, and WILLIAM KOONTZ.

I am, Mr. President, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHAUNCEY F. BLACK.

And thus, through two of the counsel in this case, we have a letter directly reaching the President from four, a majority, of the managers in this case, March 16, after, as is stated in the preamble of this resolution, the articles of impeachment had been presented to the Senate. The resolution of impeachment was passed February 24; the articles of impeachment were laid before the President March 2; the summons to appear was served upon him March 7; and his appearance ordered to take place on the 13th of March.

Without intending any attack upon the honorable managers in this case, or to connect them with any corrupt transaction whatsoever, I have nevertheless felt it to be my duty as a member of this House to say that a more improper time, a more improper place, or a more improper person in such a time and place could not have been chosen for laying the letters which were laid before the President of the United States, who was impeached before a high tribunal. For, however he might be organized; they were calculated to have upon his mind either the influence of intimidation or the influence of persuasion, or some other influence to be properly described by some stronger word than "persuasion." They were calculated to have such an influence over him as powerfully to control his action, or to threaten to control it, in the matter of this Alta Vela claim. The claim is very large, of vast magnitude, amounting to more than a million dollars, as some say to two or three millions. And the submission of such a letter as that from officers of this House, acting as its managers, at such a time as that, was calculated either to intimidate, influence, or persuade the President, and upon most men, or many men not constituted as he is, would have had a direct influence in some form or other.

Mr. HARDING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. I confess I desire a little information; I say it sincerely, although it may create a smile at my expense. But I desire to know where the gist of this offense is; how you distinguish this case from the case covered by the bill you passed a few days since, instructing the President to protect naturalized citizens abroad? I cannot understand that the recovery of this island to the jurisdiction of the United States can benefit any but the Government, if the Government has the title to it.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to enter into the merits of the Alta Vela claim, for it would take too long to do so. If the honorable gentleman will look into it, he will perceive that it is not a claim on the part of the Government, but a claim on the part of private individuals to a large amount of property, of individuals, I believe, residing in the city of Baltimore. And the whole benefits of this claim, if successful, amounting to over a million dollars, are to accrue to those individuals.

And pending this claim, with the object apparently to influence the President of the United States, a letter, an opinion, signed by four of the managers, was, through the counsel in the Alta Vela case, laid before the President of the United States. Am I understood now by the honorable gentleman on the other side? Does he not see the difference between this case and that of an island to which the Government makes claim? for the act of August, 1856, specially provides that the Government shall have no title to an island claimed as this is, but that the island may be abandoned whenever it is stripped of its guano, that being the whole property involved in the claim. The act of 1856 leaves it optional with the Government at any time to abandon the title or eminent domain of the island thus claimed.

What I have said, Mr. Speaker, has been without any desire to cast upon the managers any insinuation whatever. It is my desire that the House shall maintain its position and its honor free from all suspicions. It has undertaken to arraign the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors; and in that arraignment it is certainly its duty to stand before the Senate with clean hands, without any suspicion whatever resting upon it of any attempt to influence improperly the President of the United States; and when there is any appearance of an attempt to exert influence improperly or at an improper time the honorable managers to whom has been delegated the high and responsible and august trust of representing this House before the high court of impeachment will, I trust, explain any connection they may have had with the matter.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to ask him to whom the letter signed by the managers is addressed.

Mr. BROOKS. I thought I had explained that matter very explicitly.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I did not hear the letter read. I was not in my seat.

Mr. BROOKS. It is addressed to Colonel Shaffer.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It is not addressed to the President of the United States at all?

Mr. BROOKS. It is addressed to Colonel Shaffer, one of the counsel for the claimants in the Alta Vela case, and it is laid before the President of the United States in a letter particularly addressed to the President by another one of the counsel, Chauncey F. Black, and it is laid before the President of the United States at two different times.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter well known to the country and to this House that Mr. Black, who was one of the counsel in this case, felt himself so delicately connected with the President of the United States, whom he was about to defend before the Senate, that he deemed it his duty to resign his position as counsel for the President because he might be supposed to have some possible interest in a great claim pending before the President. I have only to express my deep regret that our managers in similar circumstances, having expressed an opinion upon a case of such vast magnitude and amount, did not feel it their duty to imitate the wise and becoming example of Mr. Black and resign their places as managers, leaving the President of the United States free from all improper influence whatever in the impeachment they were about to conduct before the Senate of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question, to allow me to offer the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. BROOKS. I would do so but for the fact that I want a vote on this question to-day, as the managers are about to reappear before the high court of impeachment. I will cheerfully yield to any gentleman upon the other side who wishes to speak on this subject, retaining, however, my right to the floor during my hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] as the Chair understands, withdraws the call for the previous question and proposes to yield to other gentlemen, retaining his right to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the amendment I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is still upon the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me be understood. I propose to retain my right to the floor in order to obtain a vote to-day, because this process of impeachment is going on, and this matter should be promptly settled. I propose to yield the remainder of my hour to any of the managers for any explanation they may desire to make, retaining my right to the floor in order to move the previous question and have a vote to-day.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I have not myself given much attention to this subject, except that I have heard broken portions of the arguments on the impeachment, and I confess I was laboring under the impression that the managers themselves had addressed a letter to the President direct upon this subject. Now, sir, all that I find is this—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HIGBY. I cannot yield at present. All that I find is simply this: the member from New York has, I believe, introduced a resolution. I came into the House while he was speaking.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman will have patience. I have yielded now to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HIGBY. I believe I have the floor, and I do not wish to be interrupted if there are any rules of the House governing debate. I know there was an attempt last evening to introduce a resolution, and I believe one has been introduced.

Mr. BROOKS. I have offered a resolution for a committee of investigation.

Mr. HIGBY. I find from the statement of the gentleman from New York, with reference to this subject, that the basis of his resolution is a letter claimed to have been addressed by some of the managers conducting the impeachment before the Senate to a gentleman by the name of Shaffer, who is said to be one of the counsel in this matter in reference to the island of Alta Vela. I wish to read that letter.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, I cannot give the gentleman time for the reading of the letter.

Mr. HIGBY. Very well; if it is well understood by the House I will not read it.

Mr. BROOKS. It has been read and has been in all the public prints.

Mr. HIGBY. I will simply say that I do not know why any member—I do not care what position he occupies before the House—cannot express an opinion such as is expressed in this paper to any individual, I care not whom, aside from the President of the United States, in respectful language and simply expressing an opinion. It strikes me as sheer nonsense for the House to occupy its attention about a matter of this kind, and I hope that the managers who are conducting the impeachment will not take the trouble to say one word on the subject. It now appears on the record simply what it is, and I hope the House will vote down the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. The remarks of the gentleman from California demand a reply, for this matter begins to assume another aspect. I would like to know why it was that of the one hundred and fifty Republican members of this House, four were selected to address a letter to the President of the United States—why four and four only? Why not the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN?] Why did they not ask him? Why not the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK?] Why were not other honorable members from Indiana and Iowa and Pennsylvania and New York asked to sign it? Why were four of the seven managers of the impeachment elected by this House appointed to address a letter to Colonel Shaffer, the counsel in the Alta Vela case, with the intention on the part of that counsel, as is proved by the facts, to lay that letter before the President of the United States and to have the influence of the names of these four managers? It is but an opinion, says the gentleman from California. It is true it is but an opinion. But upon a "high criminal," as he is characterized by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] one of the managers not now in his seat, what effect was it calculated to have—what effect upon the President's mind would an address by the majority of the managers laid before him have? I do not say that the honorable managers knew this letter was to go before the President, but I do say that the letter did go before the President and it was laid before the President by the counsel of the claimants in this Alta Vela case to whom the letter was addressed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. To whom is that letter addressed? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I have answered that question three times. [Laughter.] It was addressed, I repeat again, to the employed and paid counsel in the case, and the letter was by another counsel in the case laid twice, at two different times, before the President of the United States in a letter addressed to the President of the United States. This is but an opinion, says the gentleman from California. I have only to say upon that subject, Mr. Speaker, that upon all great claims whatsoever members of this House ought to be careful how they express their opinions upon matters upon which they are to vote, or to the Executive Departments of the Government, through letters like this one addressed to the counsel in this case, with the probability that those letters will be laid before the President of the United States.

There is some authority, a law of Congress, which forbids members of Congress appearing in certain cases before the Executive Departments and arguing them there. But here in this case is a letter, the whole force of which it is attempted to escape by saying that it is not addressed to the President of the United States, but to one of the counsel in the case.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to ask the gentleman if he knows whether this letter was laid before the President by the consent of any of these managers?

Mr. BROOKS. I want this resolution passed for the purpose of ascertaining, by means of a committee of investigation, what connection these managers had with this matter. If a committee is appointed for investigation, we shall be able to ascertain whether the letter was written for this very purpose of being laid before the President of the United States or not. I do not know what will be the course of the majority upon this floor; whether they will direct or not that this investigation shall be had. But let me tell the majority of this House that the people will not look at this matter in a merely legal point of view. But with open practical eyes they will see the facts of the case; they will see that the letter was laid before the President of the United States, and they will judge of the motives with which it was laid before him. The managers may not be in fault.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. Does it not appear, from the gentleman's own statement, that this letter was laid before the President by Chauncey F. Black?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes; and the inference is that that is what the letter was written for; to be laid before the President of the United States; that that was the whole object of writing the letter; that is the fair inference in the case.

Now, sir, from signs which I have seen on the other side of the House, I am doubtful whether this select committee is even to be appointed, but that this matter is to be allowed to go on without any further examination or inquiry whatever. I trust, however, that will not be the case. I trust that in a matter of this sort, involving a large amount of money in a claim before the executive department, the honor and dignity of this House will not rest quiet under this extraordinary proceeding. I say, sir, that in all the history of impeachments, both in this and in other countries, in all cases whatsoever where parallel trials have been had, there never has been an exhibition of this sort. And hence I pronounce it extraordinary, and a minority of this House, if not a majority, will demand such an investigation of it as can alone be obtained by the appointment of a select committee. The power of this House may be sufficient to crush the executive department through other branches of this Government. But I beg that the House will at least with dignity, with honor, with respect for itself and for its managers, pursue that course of inquiry which will enable the honorable managers—who in the other House have presented an entirely different view from that which they have presented here—I hope this House will at least pursue such an inquiry as will enable the managers to show what the facts are.

The deposition which was given by Mr. Chauncey F. Black, and which is set forth at length in the proceedings of the high court of impeachment, contains the following:

"General J. W. Shaffer having become associated with us in the case, and having learned that General BUTLER had become acquainted with the merits of the case, procured his legal opinion upon it, and also a concurrence by General LOGAN. After receiving this opinion I inclosed it to the President. The time when this opinion was received, and whether it was dated, I do not recollect. The time that it was presented to the President by me can be established by the date of my letter inclosing it." * * *

"Some considerable time after I had forwarded the original I sent this copy so signed to the President."

The issue which was made in the other House was not the issue which was made here. But it was denied in the other House that the letter was presented to the President after February 24, when the resolution of impeachment passed this House. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said then:

"This I believe to have been in the early part of February; certainly before the act was committed by Andrew Johnson which brought on this impeachment."

The honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says more explicitly:

"I merely wish to correct the gentleman from Tennessee, the counsel for the respondent, by saying that he is mistaken about this letter having been signed after the impeachment commenced by either General BUTLER or myself. I know well when I signed it, and the gentleman will find the correction, if he will examine thoroughly, and will certainly be kind enough to make it. I signed the letter long before there was anything thought of impeachment."

The issue in the other House was not the issue made here; for the letter was addressed to the counsel and sent by that counsel to the President. But the main issue, the whole body of the issue, was there denied; for it was averred that, while the letter was thus written, and though it was laid before the President, it was legally and legitimately written before February 24, when the resolution of impeachment was adopted in this House. Thus the fact was admitted that it was wrong—I will not say criminal—that it was wrong, after the impeachment had been instituted, for four managers on the part of the House to sign such a letter or opinion as that, to be laid before the President of the United States.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. BROOKS. Indefinitely.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the gentleman yielding indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman holding the floor has a right, under the rule, to yield for an explanation of the pending measure.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, is it proper for the gentleman from Illinois to take the floor as often as he does without leave.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has a right to raise a question of order, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] often does, and arrest business until the Chair has decided the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was not a question of order which the gentleman raised.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois made the point of order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] could not yield the floor indefinitely. The Chair decided that he could do so. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure, as well as for personal explanation."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has a right under this rule to yield for an explanation of the pending proposition.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that my distinguished colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who rarely obtains an opportunity to speak on any subject, has not the floor entirely this afternoon for his own purposes. But still I imagine that, notwithstanding his extraordinary diffidence and modesty, he will, upon some occasion, have an opportunity to speak upon this question.

I have sought the floor, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saying but a word to explain the reasons which shall control my action and vote upon this question. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] and other gentlemen seem to take it for granted that as this communication was addressed to Colonel Shaffer it can have no significance whatever, and could not have been intended to influence the mind or action of the President.

Now, Mr. Speaker, no sane man acts without some motive. This letter was written for some purpose. It was written to influence the mind and action of some person—some person who had a right to exercise some influence with regard to the control of this island of Alta Vela. Colonel Shaffer was already counsel for the claimants, who are citizens of Baltimore. His mind was already made up. He had no power to control the action of the Government in regard to the seizure of this island and placing it in possession of the claimants. The letter, therefore, was not written, and could not have been written, for the purpose of influencing the mind or action of Colonel Shaffer. It must have been written to control or influence the action of some person who had some power over the course of the Government with regard to this island. Who was that person? Whose mind was it expected, by the managers and other gentlemen who signed this letter, to influence? Whose action was to be affected by their legal opinion in regard to the validity of the claim? It was not Colonel Shaffer. There is not a sane man in this House or in the country who will come to the conclusion that this letter was written for the purpose of influencing the opinion or the action of Colonel Shaffer. It was to influence the opinion or action of some other person.

The President of the United States was the only person whose mind and action it was important to influence. He was the only person whose mind and action the claimants could have desired to influence; and it must have been for the purpose of bringing to bear some influence upon the President of the United States that this letter was written and signed. The gentleman from California does not look at this transaction in its proper light when he says that it is of an entirely trivial character and has no significance whatever.

Now, whether for the managers on the part of the House, occupying the peculiar situation they did with reference to the House, with reference to the President, with reference to the country, to sign a letter which they must have known at the time was obtained for the purpose of influencing the action of the President upon so delicate a matter of State as that of seizing by force an island claimed by a foreign country, was a proper or an improper act is for the House and for the country to decide; and in deciding it members must act upon their own judgment and their own responsibility in casting the votes which they give upon this resolution. I think it will strike the sense of every man throughout the country that if this letter was written and signed after the articles of impeachment were ordered by the House it was highly improper on the part of the managers, and that it was an act which is highly censurable, and ought, at least, to be censured and condemned by the House. And for this reason I shall vote for the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York.

There is no question now before the House as to the justice and right of this claim to Alta Vela, or of the propriety of the action of either Judge Black or the President, or indeed of the correctness of the legal opinion given by these gentlemen who are managers on the part of the House. I am inclined myself to think that the claim is a valid one, and that these American citizens should be protected in their rights. Undoubtedly they should if they have rights in the premises. But that does not by any means settle the question now before us for consideration. Did these gentlemen, while acting as managers on the part of the House for the impeachment of the President, attempt, by means of the paper read, to influence by intimidation, persuasion, or otherwise, the President to use the power of the Government and by actual force to enforce against a foreign Government a claim of citizens (held by the State Department not to be a valid claim) to property worth millions; and if they did so, was the act a proper one on their part, or was it not highly improper and censurable? Could they with propriety hold any communication with the President upon such matters while acting in their office of managers? These are questions affecting the honor of these gentlemen and the honor and dignity of the House. They cannot be covered up or hidden from view by idle declamation or general disclaimer. It is due to these gentlemen themselves and due to the House and the country that the real facts of the case should be developed and settled by proper evidence, and for these reasons I shall vote for the resolution. I think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to say only a single word in reply to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HENRY.] He seems to think that this letter was not designed to operate upon the mind of the President. The letter bears evidence upon its own face that that was its purpose and object, and if gentlemen recollect the concluding words of the letter they must see it. General BUTLER says, in writing to Colonel Shaffer:

"I have never been able to understand why the Executive did not long since assert the rights of the Government to sustain the rightful claims of its citizens to the possession of the island in the most forcible manner consistent with the dignity and power of the nation."

Now, I insist that the letter shows upon its face the purpose and object for which it was written. But if that were not so, Mr. Speaker, if the letter did not bear that interpretation, the question has already arisen not only in the impeachment trial, but it is raised here in this House, and neither gentlemen on the other side nor the managers can escape the conclusion that it may possibly have been written for that purpose.

The newspapers of the country have already commented upon it, both upon the one side and upon the other; and the object, let it be remembered, of raising this committee is simply to inquire and ascertain the facts. If it shall not appear, when this committee shall have been raised and the testimony shall have been taken, that this letter was written for the purpose of influencing the mind of the President, it may go very far to exculpate the managers from any charge or inference of wrong against them growing out of the writing and indorsing of this letter. That is a material fact to be ascertained. That is a fact which they should desire to have ascertained. If they have acted honorably and honestly and uprightly in this matter it is for their interest; and I shall be very much surprised if they do not insist upon the passage of this resolution that inquiry may be made upon this subject; for their own honor and their own characters as individuals and as members of this House, as well as for the character of the House itself, they ought to rise in their seats and demand this investigation. They ought to do it for their own exculpation, if they can be exculpated, for the charge has been made. I make no remark that insinuates that any intention or purpose of theirs was wrong. It is not my purpose or desire. It is not necessary. But the resolution asks for a committee of inquiry to ascertain the truth of the charge in which the country is at this time particularly interested and in which I think gentlemen in this House, every member of it, and especially the managers, are particularly interested.

Mr. BROOKS. How much more time have I? The SPEAKER. The gentlemen has eighteen minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOKS. I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman first yield to me for an inquiry in reference to the date of the letter?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. I understand that the managers deny that this letter was written after the impeachment, and I would inquire of the gentleman from New York what evidence there is that this letter was written after the impeachment? I understand that all the guilt or wrong in the matter would be in its having been written after the impeachment.

Mr. BROOKS. It is because there was in the Senate a dispute as to the date. It is for that very purpose that I desire the appointment of this select committee of investigation. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] I will say that there are two proofs, or three, or in point of fact there are four proofs that this is dated March 9. The first is the letter which I read, with only three signatures, those of the three generals, BUTLER, LOGAN, and GARFIELD; the other was that with the signatures of two other managers, and of other gentlemen, whose names I have read, and whose names were signed to it subsequently at a later period than March 9, which is shown by the letter of Chauncey F. Black, addressed to the President, which I also read in a former part of this debate. This was the third proof that the letter was written at that time. And in addition to all that, is the deposition of Chauncey F. Black, as set forth in the report of proceedings of the high court of impeachment, and an extract from which I read a short time ago. All of these things corroborate the fact that this letter was written on March 9.

The President has two letters dated March 9, the first signed by three gentlemen, the other signed by five other gentlemen, being a copy of the first letter, dated March 9, making the proof irrefutable that the letter was dated March 9.

Mr. CHANLER. Will my colleague yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANLER. This is evidently a question of reputation. And as the managers are engaged in a similar investigation, a very delicate point presents itself to my mind, and that is in how far the House can challenge the character of its own officers, engaged in the discharge of a great public duty, until they have fulfilled the duty delegated to them. If the gentlemen managers, or the honorable managers are honorable managers, there will be no question left in the minds of the people of this country as to whether they have or have not faltered in their duty and endeavored to treat with the Executive. They have their own honor in their own hands; they have the honor of this House in their hands.

Therefore, if they propose to carry on this trial honestly and honorably, if they have begun it with that motive, then they will insist upon the appointment of this investigating committee. There is no question but that of reputation in the matter with which this House has anything to do, until a bill shall be brought in here to settle the question of title to that island, and to put it upon the law of nations, and to place the determination of it upon those to whom it belongs.

The question of investigation, therefore, is not a political question. Neither this side of the House nor the other side of the House have anything to do with this for the purpose of making political capital.

Now, sir, my object in rising at this time is to say that, so far as this Alta Vela claim is concerned, there are two sides to it; it is now in litigation. And in voting I do not wish to appear as taking sides with Mr. Black and his party, or with Mr. White and his party, or whoever the other party may be. I shall vote on this question as I voted on the demand of one of the managers [Mr. LOGAN] with regard to alleged frauds in the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department. An investigation initiated in the Thirty-Eighth Congress by my colleague, [Mr. BROOKS.] and defeated in the House at that time, was opened again in this Congress by one of the honorable managers, from that high sense of honor which has hitherto guided him.

I have nothing more to say in regard to this question than this: as it is a question of reputation it is with the gentlemen of the majority here to protect the reputation of the managers whom they alone elected to represent the House in this trial.

Mr. BROOKS. With a word or two more, I propose to call the previous question, unless some gentleman on the other side may desire to put some question to me. In the letter addressed by Chauncey F. Black to the President, which I will read again, is a collocation of names to which I wish to call the attention of the House, showing that it was intended to influence the President from the very collocation of the names of the managers:

"Mr. President, I have heretofore handed you a letter embracing the opinions of Generals BUTLER, LOGAN, and GARFIELD in respect to our claims to Alta Vela. Please find herewith a copy of the same, with the concurrence of THADDEUS STEVENS, JOHN A. BINGHAM, J. G. BLAINE, J. K. MOORHEAD, and WILLIAM KOONTZ."

In the letter, as signed, the name of Mr. STEVENS occurs after those of Mr. KOONTZ and Mr. MOORHEAD, and the name of JOHN A. BINGHAM is signed last; but in the collocation of the names in the communication addressed by the counsel in this case to the President the names of the managers, Messrs. STEVENS and BINGHAM, are taken out of their original places and put before the names of others who are not managers, showing an intent and design through the counsel in this case to influence the President.

One word further and I am done. I again ask the House for what other purpose than to influence the President were the names of four managers, a majority of those managers, selected for special prominence and those of no others? Why do we find put forward the name of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] whom I now see before me, the ruler of this end of the Government, the autocrat, the dictator, the great power and authority in this country, before whom all other authorities must bow—the Jupiter Tonans not only of this House, but of the Republican party in this country—the man having power to overawe not only the Supreme Court of the United States, but the Senate of the United States? Why was his name taken from among those of many other gentlemen and sent to the President of the United States if not to influence and control him? I wish that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would avail himself of an opportunity to answer this question.

I move the previous question:

The previous question was not seconded; there being—ayes 24, noes 75.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move the amendment I indicated, to strike out all of the resolution after the word "Resolved," and insert these words: "That consent is given to the managers and any other members of the House to be heard on any question of personal explanation connected with the trial of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson."

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want it to be understood that I rise in obedience to any order or requirement of the House that I should answer for anything I have done; for, sir, I have done nothing but what I would do again. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is serious in bringing this matter before the House, if he is honest, if he is truly a gentleman, then I will say to him that he would not offer this resolution did he understand the facts as he professes to understand them. What are the facts? What is this grave and serious charge which the gentleman from New York has made against a portion of the managers on the part of the House? What crimes have we committed? Of what offenses have we been guilty against the law or against the well-being of the people of this country, that the gentleman should seek to arraign us at the bar of this House? From him ought else could have been expected than what he has done. The only defense that has been made for the greatest criminal this country has ever known has been just such a defense as is pretended to be made by those gentlemen who have taken the floor here this evening, villainously attacking men who are as honest—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is not parliamentary.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I withdraw the word.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman must keep within the rules. I shall call him to order every time he transgresses them.

Mr. LOGAN. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. I have the right to do it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that the gentleman from Illinois shall take his seat, and that the disorderly language shall be reduced to writing.

Mr. LOGAN. I have withdrawn the offensive word.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But I understand the gentleman's taunt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes his point too late.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No business has transpired since the language was used.

The SPEAKER. There has been discussion between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] The point must be made immediately.

Mr. LOGAN. I withdraw the word "villainously," but will still use the word "attacking," if that will suit the gentlemen. I presume they will not object to it, for it does seem to me an attack—a combined, preconcerted attack—arranged, however, not in this House, for I have understood that it was arranged before. I was notified this thing would be done. I expected it would be done. I could have expected nothing else from gentlemen who have the honor of this country at stake, as they say they have; gentlemen who have voted against impeachment all the time. Nobody would have expected anything else. They wanted something on which to hang speeches to send before the country. They want to attack the reputation and character of some of the managers, who, I presume, stand equally as high as they do themselves; I will not say higher, but equally as high. They desire to bring them into disrepute, if they can, before the country.

But I will say this to the gentlemen: so far as I am concerned, I care nothing for these attacks. So far as I am concerned I can expect nothing else. I have never received anything else at the hands of these gentlemen except attacks, and I do not expect ever to receive anything else at their hands. Certainly, I never expect to receive kindness at their hands. But this attack made on this letter, this great bugaboo, this grand discovery made by some gentleman, was thrown into an argument in the Senate by a gentleman who is one of the attorneys of the President, dragged into an argument where it had nothing to do, when it was not in evidence and no part or parcel of the case whatever, suggested, I presume, from the fruitful brain and imagination of the President or somebody else.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Why, certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. Did the gentleman from Illinois hear, or not having heard, did he read, the argument of his colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL?]

Mr. LOGAN. I did.

Mr. PHELPS. In that argument he charged upon the President that he had been abandoned by one of his counsel, Judge Black, the counsel for the claimants in this case; and it was in reply to that statement that this was brought in.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that perfectly; and this letter had nothing in the world to do with the statement of Governor BOUTWELL, and had no connection with the case, and I will show the House that it had not.

But I was going to remark that it reminded me of a young man that I heard of once who, in his youthful days, thought he had made a great discovery; and in that, I presume, he was like the gentleman from New York. He went to visit the Mammoth Cave. He stood there in front of it for some time, gazing in wonder and astonishment, and he commenced talking about the grandeur of it, and exclaimed:

"Great God Almighty, what a spot!
In summer cold, in winter hot.
Powers above, Great God, I wonder,
General Jackson, hades and thunder."

The discovery on the part of that young man was like the discovery which the gentleman has made. What is it? When this matter was up in the Senate I said that I had done naught but what I would do again; nor have I. What did we do? General BUTLER wrote a letter to Colonel J. W. Shaffer, of Illinois, an old acquaintance of mine and a gentleman, too, stating that he thought the Government of the United States had a right to exercise its authority over the island of Alta Vela and to protect its citizens there under the laws of this country. That was all. It was an opinion which he gave to Colonel Shaffer. I said I concurred in that opinion. I would do the very same thing this day. That is our offense, and that is all. I did not sign it for the President; I did not direct it to the President; I did not expect the President would ever see it. The first I heard of it was when the President, before Mr. BOUTWELL had said a word, published this letter in the New York Herald, as he is in the habit of doing every letter which falls into his hands. I signed that letter giving a mere opinion as to the rights of this Government. When the gentleman from New York says that it is a claim for a million dollars, that is not true, and he knows it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the words of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

The SPEAKER. The words will be taken down, and the Chair will rule upon them.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I will withdraw them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I submit that it is too late for that to be done.

Mr. LOGAN. I will substitute the words "or ought to have known it."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that the Chair shall rule upon the words objected to by me.

The SPEAKER. The words having been taken down, will now be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That is not true, and he knows it."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that those words are not unparliamentary. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] had made use of opprobrious words sometimes used, but which the Chair will not repeat, he would have been out of order. But any gentleman has the right to say that a proposition is not true, and possibly that the one making it knew it was not true. The Chair thinks the words used may be severe, but they are not offensive in that sense in which it is forbidden to members to use offensive language toward their fellow-members, and did not seem to be uttered in an offensive tone.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] from some reason or other, is always very nervous when I am on the floor; perhaps because I pay so little attention to what he says. I said the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] was not true, and that he knew it. If it will be more agreeable to him, I will say that he ought to know it.

Now, why ought he to know it? There is no claim in this Alta Vela matter against this Government for one cent. If the gentleman knows anything about it, he knows there is no claim against the Government. He knows that statement is not true, or he ought to know it. He knows that this letter did not affect the claim; or, if he did not know it, he is as ignorant as a man can be. And he certainly is not ignorant; at least no one would think so, from the amount of talk he gives us occasionally.

Now, what is it? It is not a claim. The statement is not true that we recommended a claim. I will not say that the statement was made knowing it was untrue. But it has been thrown before the country in a light to induce people to believe that we signed a recommendation for a claim, when the gentlemen who hatched this thing all knew there was no such recommendation.

Then what did we sign? A mere opinion as to the right of this Government to protect its citizens in taking guano from the island of Alta Vela. That is all there is in it. We had a right to give such an opinion. I did it, not as a member of Congress. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] says we have to vote upon this matter. He knows that it is not so. He knew when he made that statement that it imported that which was not a verity; that he was suggesting to the country that which in itself was false; that there was no vote to be taken by this Congress upon any claim of this kind, or he ought to know it. Then why state things to the country in a false light?

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to get the gentleman right, if he will permit me.

Mr. LOGAN. I was speaking of the other gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHANLER. There was no "other gentleman from New York" who has spoken upon this subject but myself. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he referred to me.

Mr. LOGAN. I say that when the gentleman said we signed a document in reference to a claim upon which we would have to vote in this Congress he stated that which was not true, because there is no such claim before Congress.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg pardon; if the gentleman will allow me I will state what I did say.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot yield.

Mr. CHANLER. I deny that I said any such thing. On the contrary, I said that this was a question not of title, but purely a question of reputation, and that we could not act upon any question relative to Alta Vela until a bill was brought in here based upon the law of nations to test the title. That is what I said.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. CHANLER. I wanted to avoid entering at all into this question. I simply desired to counteract the effect of the remarks made by the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] which were calculated to induce gentlemen on the other side of the House not to speak in reply to this charge.

Mr. LOGAN. That is satisfactory. I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he spoke of this as a question to be voted upon by Congress. Now, sir, if this is a question which is never to be acted upon by Congress, how could there be anything wrong in a member of Congress signing an opinion upon the subject? I have my opinions as a member of Congress and as an individual and as a lawyer. I may give my opinion as a lawyer, though not as an attorney in a particular case. I am not an attorney in this case; I never expect or intend to be. But, sir, I want to answer the insinuation of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] He has insinuated that this is a claim in which there is something corrupt, something wrong, and that therefore it should be investigated.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Illinois, when he speaks of the "gentleman from New York," please designate to which gentleman he refers?

Mr. LOGAN. I refer now to the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. CHANLER. I only wanted to know if the gentleman was referring to me.

Mr. LOGAN. If these gentlemen will let me alone until I get through I shall finish much sooner; I am sure I did not bother either of them during the course of their remarks. But, sir, I understand this whole programme perfectly, and I think I shall explain myself so as to be understood by the country. I think they will be perfectly understood by the country, and I know I shall be.

Now, sir, so far as regards signing this letter with the view to its going before the President of the United States, I deny it. I say I never signed it for the purpose of having it before the President. But I will tell the gentleman what, perhaps, he knows already, but has not stated: I never talked to Mr. Jeremiah Black about this case in my life. I do not think that during my whole life I have ever spoken to him. I would know him if I saw him on the street; but that is the extent of my knowledge of him. With his son, Chauncey F. Black, I had no acquaintance until recently, and the acquaintance I have formed with him has been merely casual.

Colonel Shaffer I know well; and he, as I have already remarked, came to me with this letter. I read it, and I signed it, not with any intention that it should go before the President, but upon the statement of Colonel Shaffer that he had an interest in the claim, and that he would like to have the opinion of persons who had examined the claim, as to the validity of the title of the Government, or whether the Government had a right to exercise jurisdiction. This explains my whole reason in signing that letter; this is all I intended when I signed it.

Let me state what Mr. Chauncey F. Black told me, and I have no doubt he will tell the same to the gentleman himself. After this letter was brought out before the Senate by Mr. Nelson I sent for Mr. Black. I sent Colonel Shaffer for him. I asked Mr. Black why he had sent that letter to the President? Mr. Black told me that he had done it without the knowledge of his father or of anybody else; but that the President had told him and his father over and over again that he would make the order they desired; he had promised to make such an order. And Mr. Black said to me, "Now, Mr. LOGAN, I thought that inasmuch as Colonel Shaffer had those letters, probably it might be of some advantage to send them to the President; and I did so. I did not think anything about the position you were in, or I would not have done so." This is the statement he made when I asked him why he had taken such a liberty as this. He said that he had done it without consulting with his father or with any one of us, which is certainly the fact, so far as I am concerned. Hence this letter went to the President without my knowledge, and I signed it with no intention that it should ever be laid before the President.

What else? Why, the President has acted in this case as he always acts. Mr. Black tells me that Mr. Johnson suggested to him to get the names of some members of Congress to a paper in order to authorize him to do this thing, and at that suggestion of the President Mr. Black came here and got Mr. GARFIELD and others to sign it. That is what Mr. Black told me, and I guess it is the fact. And the very minute he gets the names of these men to that paper, what does he do? He turns round and puts you forward as a catspaw in order to say to the country that these men are trying to influence him and publishes the letter. He himself, by a trick, got the names of the two other managers, Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. STEVENS. Mr. STEVENS and Mr. BINGHAM signed it long after Mr. BUTLER and I signed it, because Mr. Black told me himself that at the suggestion of the President he got the names of some members of Congress. He came down here himself and got these names to that paper without their knowing that it was to be used in any way whatever. These are the facts about it, and either it was a trick of the President, and your trick, or else you are a catspaw of the President.

Now, this is the conduct on the part of the President, and this is the conduct on the part of these gentlemen whom he is using here in order to try and attack the character of the members of the board of managers before the country. This, sir, is all there is in this case. This is all the connection I ever had with it, and all that I ever knew about it. I signed that letter without any intent whatever, without any knowledge whatever that it was to go before the President, and I presume that was the case with every one of the managers who did sign it. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that I have refused for two years to sign any paper of any character whatever either for man or woman that was to go before the President when I knew it. No paper can be produced that I ever signed with any intention that it should go before him, because I did not want him to have my name to anything, and he never had it with my consent.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to know, for information, whom this recommendation was intended to influence?

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, I will explain to the gentleman. It was not intended to influence anybody, but merely to give Colonel Shaffer an opinion as to his rights or the right of the United States to protect the American citizens on the island of Alta Vela. That was all. It was merely for his satisfaction. That is all it was to influence. Is every letter that is written or everything that is signed to influence somebody? Does the gentleman from Illinois, the musical gentleman, the gentleman who gets up so much "laughter" in this House, presume that I could influence the President of the United States?

Mr. ROSS. I merely asked for information.

Mr. LOGAN. Ah! Why he knows that Andrew Johnson would not be influenced by what I might do any more than I would be by what the gentleman from Illinois might do.

Mr. ROSS. I did not know but that as you were prosecuting him you might have some influence.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, there is an insinuation that could come only from a base heart.

The SPEAKER. That remark, the Chair will state, is not parliamentary if the gentleman refers to his colleague.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir, I withdraw it. But I will say this, that if I were to insinuate against a gentleman that because he was prosecuting a man he would sign a paper to influence him I would have a base heart. I will say that, sir.

Now, sir, I say to these gentlemen that they have made all out of this case that I presume they can make. They want a committee to investigate. Why, I am ready to be investigated at any time so far as I am concerned. But what do you want to investigate? Do you want to investigate the fact whether we signed the letter or not? We acknowledge that we signed it? Do you want to investigate the fact who the letter was addressed to? There it is on the face of it. What do you want to investigate? What do you want to know? For base party purposes these men would destroy the reputation of men as honorable as they are if they only had the power.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman to yield. I do not want him to be always retracting and repeating. If he will recollect what he has just said—that "these men" have asked for this investigation, not from any personal regard for the President, nor from any regard for the managers themselves, or for the House whom the managers represent—he charges that "these men" would, if they had the power, destroy the reputation of some four persons; and when he says that he certainly does not know what he is saying or he does not mean what he says.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot yield to the gentleman any longer.

Mr. CHANLER. The object of this resolution is to enable the managers to remove the suspicion which rests upon them.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not yield any longer. In conclusion, allow me to say this, so far as I am concerned: any insinuation that I have or ever had any interest in this Alta Vela matter, either directly or indirectly, remotely or in expectancy, or in any manner that mind can imagine, or that I signed that letter with any intent to influence the President, or that he would see it, or have any knowledge of it in any way whatever, is false, let it be stated by whom it may. I have stated the facts correctly, as they exist in the case; and that is all that I desire to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I think that a word of explanation as to the island of Alta Vela will be necessary in order to an exact understanding of this matter. By the act of August, 1856, it is provided that when any island is discovered having upon it valuable deposits of guano, if it is an unappropriated island, it shall exclusively belong to the discoverer, if he be a citizen of the United States.

Something more than a year ago I was in the office of the Attorney General of the United States, and at his request listened to a full discussion of the matter of Alta Vela. I there learned that Alta Vela is a small island lying south of Hayti, and belonging to that Government, if it belong to any other Government than our own; that the guano upon it had been discovered by two Americans; that the island had been long known as a beacon, but was supposed to be an unprofitable and worthless key; that these two Americans took the proper steps to file in the State Department the evidence of their title to the guano upon it by discovery, and had proceeded to work that valuable deposit; that some inhabitants of Dominica, under the lead of their chief, who afterward ran away, made an expedition to this island, captured the employes of the claimants to it, destroyed their works, and tore down the American flag, for which they ought to have been shot on the spot, and for which they would have been hanged under any just administration of international law. Having torn down our flag they took possession of the island, and after a considerable period of time the Dominicans leased the island to a New York company.

Then the original discoverers so despoiled came to our Government and asked that their employes might be liberated, and they were liberated. They also asked that they might be put back in possession of the island, and there they met with difficulty, because putting them in possession of the island would set aside the New York company. And whether rightfully or wrongfully, it has been very hard for some years past to touch New York firms through the State Department.

The question was, shall the Government interfere in this matter? The deposit of guano was a limited one, and this is almost the only island on this side of the continent containing such a deposit, and from its nearness to market it is very valuable. As soon as the New York firm got possession of it they ran ships there as fast as they could in order to carry the guano all off before this Government should take any steps in favor of the original discoverers.

After hearing the facts of the case, I said I thought it was a case in which the Government ought to send out a ship of war; not for the purpose of making war on anybody but for the purpose of saying, backed by sufficient force, "hands off; let no one carry away a load of that guano until the title to this matter is determined by the courts." In other words, I thought an injunction should be served on the parties who were carrying away this guano, and this could only be done under the circumstances by a vessel of war. I think while the question is delayed in the State Department those parties who had thus got possession, I will not even say wrongfully, as the other party claims, should not be allowed to carry off all that made the island valuable, and prevent any subsequent redress, if the others were in the right. To the opinion then expressed I still adhere.

This is the opinion which I expressed in the presence of the Attorney General after hearing the case discussed by Judge Black. I never heard or knew anything about Alta Vela from that time until some time last February—I think about the 9th or 10th of February, as near as I can remember—when my friend, Colonel Shaffer, the friend of Lincoln—a man whom I never saw until Mr. Lincoln sent him to me, and who proved himself the ablest quartermaster in any division of our Army—came to me and said, "I have taken some interest in Alta Vela; I am not learned in the law to the extent which I wish I was; I am not so well known as a lawyer as you are; I have learned from Mr. Black that you have heard Alta Vela discussed. Did you come to an opinion about it?" I replied that I had done so. "Well," said he, "perhaps if I had your opinion upon the validity of the title and that of some others I might be able to convert my interest into cash or dispose of it, if it were understood that the Government might interfere, if there was a clear case in which the Government could assert its authority. Now, will you give me your opinion as a lawyer?" I replied, "Certainly. Sit down and write out an opinion yourself." He did so with pencil on a little piece of paper, which I now hold in my hand. When I read what he had written I said, "This will not quite do. Lawyers do not talk exactly so positively in this way." I then took my pen and scratched out the words which I thought were too strong and wrote in others. Anybody who examines this paper must see that it is the original rough draft. I then directed this to be copied, and when it had been copied I signed it. I had at that time no more thought or expectation that the President would be impeached immediately than I had of flying. I knew he would be ultimately, because I knew he never would lie still until he was impeached. [Laughter.] So far I had impeachment in my mind, but no further. From that hour until I saw this letter in the New York Herald I never heard of it, and I never spoke to anybody about it, and no man ever spoke to me about it. When I read it in the Herald I saw the President was publishing it as in some way connected with his quarrel with Mr. Black.

Now, sir, these are the facts as to the origin and purpose of the opinion. Let us see what is the accusation brought against me. It is that I have written a letter—which is not a letter after all, for it is a legal opinion, and I still think a pretty good legal opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts at that time know that the President had expressed a wish to have the opinion of some distinguished gentlemen on the other side in favor of the claim?

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all; I will explain all about that before I get through. I had not the slightest idea of the kind. The next time the matter was brought to my attention was when I read the letter in the Herald, and subsequently when Mr. Nelson brought it up in the Senate. I saw that Judge Black, whom I had not spoken with for months, had left the President's employment as counsel in the impeachment case, and that was the only thing that attracted my attention to the matter at all.

Now, then, what is the accusation? The accusation is that I wrote a letter. I did so; I gave an opinion. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] says I must not give opinions. Well, I agree it is a great deal the best not to give an opinion about other people's contests. I generally refuse to give opinions about other people's contests unless I am of counsel, and I very frequently refuse to give opinions and very frequently and, indeed, always, I refuse to undertake any lawsuits where I have a personal difficulty or personal difference with any of the parties, because I do not think it proper to carry on lawsuits to eke out personal revenge or carry on investigations to eke out personal revenge. Perhaps I can give an instance illustrating this rule of mine which may be interesting to the gentleman from New York. Some time ago there was a case where one Clark, if I remember his name aright, sued a fellow by the name of Erastus Brooks, who was the owner of a newspaper—a penny-a-line sheet called the Express, in New York. [Laughter.] And there was a difficulty between this Erastus Brooks and his other partner and this Clark about the division of the spoils of the partnership. And Clark brought a suit and some harpies in interest brought the case to me. They showed me that two brothers—this Erastus Brooks he had a brother who was a partner—had robbed this Clark, and there was sworn testimony about it. They brought me the sworn oath of the brother of Erastus Brooks that he did not know enough to add up a column of figures, and therefore he did not know but what he had cheated his partner. Well, I said, "Now, you know that I have not any cause to love a portion of this firm and I will not take your retainer; I will have nothing to do with it; go away; it is a nasty mess anyhow, and I will not mix up with it, if you please." [Laughter.] No, not nastier than guano, as a friend asks me, but not half as fertilizing, I assure you. [Laughter.] Well, I saw this case go on in the courts. I saw that the holders of the Express got beat and had to pay costs and charges and all that, but I never knew which side was wrong. There was rascality there somewhere. The court settled it, and I have no doubt settled it right; the verdict shows that, and I suppose judgment followed the verdict.

Now, there was a case where I was wiser than I was now and where I did not give an opinion. I should probably have got into a scrape if I had and should have been abused by somebody or abused somebody about it—one or the other. [Laughter.]

Well, I gave an opinion in this matter and this has been the result. I have made some investigations about this opinion since it was given. I have made some examination since and I find this to be the state of facts, as accurately as I can learn them. I find that my letter was sent to the President inclosed in another letter by Mr. Chauncey F. Black. He states in his affidavit, which was read by the gentleman from New York, "after receiving this opinion I inclosed it to the President." That letter of inclosure never has made its appearance. It is kept back by the President or his friends or somebody. I should like to see that letter of inclosure because it might explain some of these matters; but it does not make for the President's case, either here or elsewhere, and therefore it is not produced, otherwise it would have been.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if it does not appear in the affidavit of Mr. Chauncey F. Black that this letter inclosed was a copy of the first letter sent to the President?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no, sir; no, no. Let me read it:

"After receiving this opinion I inclosed it to the President. The time when this opinion was received, and whether it was dated, I do not recollect. The time that it was presented to the President by me can be established by the date of my letter inclosing it. Learning from a mutual friend that it would be desirable for the President to receive the recommendations of other members of Congress I carried a copy of the opinion to the House of Representatives and procured the signatures of some of my personal friends and asked them to procure the signatures of others which were attached to the copy. Some considerable time after I had forwarded the original I sent this copy so signed to the President."

And here is the letter in which he sent the copy after he had procured the signatures:

March 16.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have heretofore handed you a letter embracing the opinions of Generals BUTLER, LOGAN, and GARFIELD in respect to our claim to Alta Vela. Please find herewith a copy of the same with the concurrence of THADDEUS STEVENS, &c.

Showing that long before that, my opinion had gone to the President.

Now, then, I say I have made some further investigation, and I find that Judge Black did not know of the existence of either the original papers or of the copy until the President showed them to him himself, and as I am told said in substance to those interested about the case, "I believe you are right about Alta Vela; I believe I ought to do it; I am ready to do it; I should be glad to do it; but Seward will not let me; his New York friends are interested in this matter and he will not let me. Now, if you will get some other members of Congress to sign the letter, so as to stiffen me up, that they may stand by me against Mr. Seward, so that he shall not go to the House and complain of me, I will be ready to do it."

And thereupon, without consulting me, or without consulting any of these gentlemen upon this coming to his knowledge, Mr. Chauncey Black says that he asked a few of his personal friends to sign it; his old neighbor from Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS;] his old professional friend from Ohio, [General GARFIELD,] to get others; and they signed it.

Now, what did they sign? They signed what has been put before the country as a claim. Now, I beg pardon of the House; there is no claim in this matter against this Government. This Government is not to be called upon to pay a dollar out of its Treasury in any way because of Alta Vela. When gentlemen say there is a million of dollars in it, all I can say is that I do not know whether there is or not; I never asked.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the interest which Colonel Shaffer said he could sell out or dispose of?

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose it is the interest in the guano on the island which belonged to him and his associates. It is nothing for which the United States Government has to pay a dollar, or for which in any event it will take a dollar out of its Treasury.

Now, the extent of our offending is this, and nothing more: that we have signed an opinion that it is the "duty of the Government of the United States in the most forcible manner consistent with the honor and dignity of the Government" to protect its citizens. That is the opinion which I signed. And I am ready to sign such an opinion now or hereafter whenever I am asked so to do.

Am I alone in this opinion? Sir, the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, without my knowledge, passed a resolution upon this very subject to the same effect as my own opinion. And the Legislature of New Jersey—Ah! my friends on the other side—the Legislature of New Jersey has just passed a resolution in favor of the claimants to Alta Vela, probably according to your theory to influence the President to do a wrong.

A MEMBER. A Democratic Legislature.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say a "Democratic Legislature," because I supposed the gentleman on the other side knew that. There are so few of them that they can easily keep an account of them. [Laughter.]

Now, it is known everywhere that this question is a question of international law, upon which I may be either right or wrong. But as long as I exist I purpose to sign just such opinions as this whenever I think the occasion calls for it.

Now, I desire to make another observation. Governor BOWWELL mentioned in his argument the public notorious fact that there was a quarrel between Judge Black and the President. He said it showed that the President meant to strike down every man who disagreed with him. Thereupon Mr. Nelson, to show that Governor BOWWELL was right in that, came in and with this correspondence tried to strike down Judge Black, although he was the President's friend and had spent and been spent in his service. And this same Mr. Nelson, who represents the President in this attack, agreed with Judge Black as to the justice of the Alta Vela case, and pressed the duty of interference on the attention of the President, as I am informed, and verily believe, and said that the President ought to take the action requested of him. The whole question was whether the President would or would not do it, not whether he thought he ought to do it.

A single word further and I have done. I am not called upon to defend Judge Black; he is amply able to take care of himself upon the reasons why he left the case of the President. Now, I want gentlemen to say what they understand we proposed to influence the President to do? To influence the President to protect American citizens in their rights. Do they say it was to make war on Dominica? Poh! We make war on Dominica! Shoot off a twenty-four pounder at a pig-sty? Not at all. No one expected any war. All that was asked was that the President should protect American citizens in their rights. That is all. We tried to influence him to do that; and in this it is thought we acted inconsistently with our duty. Do gentlemen on the other side dare to say that we conspired with Judge Black to prevent him from acting as counsel for the President in the impeachment? Is that what they mean to charge? Anybody who wants to make that issue must fight it out with Judge Black, for so far as I am concerned, I should rather have Judge Black opposed to me as counsel in the defense of the President, than to have a soi disant Republican put forward to defend him.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to say that he has now very adroitly touched the very point at issue. The suspicion has, I think, found a place in the public mind that such a conspiracy did exist; and it is very evident that if there is any merit in this resolution it is that it is calculated to draw from the gentlemen connected with the matter a denial that there was any such conspiracy.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, sir, I can say that Judge Black did not know, so far as I am aware, of the existence of the fact of the letters. I did not know any fact of that sort, and I have nothing further to say upon that subject than that it never was thought of, or known, by any manager that Black was to retire till he had done so. I desire to say nothing further now, but repeat, that so far from desiring that Judge Black should not defend Andrew Johnson, that I would much rather have a well-known, well-understood Democratic politician and lawyer, like Judge Black, defending the President to-day, than any man who claims to be a Republican doing so, thus "stealing the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in." [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not intend, Mr. Speaker, to take any part in this discussion; but in consequence of the direction which has been given to the debate by the gentlemen who, in my judgment, are the only gentlemen who can have any personal interest in this question, I desire to make a few remarks.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has said that he does not appear before the House because of any right on the part of the House to require him to appear, or because of any demand which the House has made upon him. That, Mr. Speaker, is a matter entirely with the gentleman from Illinois. The public has made something more of this question than he would seem to think when he tells us that he does not feel called upon to make any answer upon this question.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] has very well suggested the real gist of this question, and if I had drawn this resolution and made the remarks introducing it I should have stated that as the real question; for let gentlemen dodge and squirm and retreat and draw back as they may, yet there is a strange coincidence between the fact of this letter being sent to the President under the circumstances through which it was obtained and the fact that Judge Black withdrew from the defense of the President, and that immediately afterward the Republican papers throughout the country took up the matter, declaring that the President had been abandoned by his principal counsel because of the conviction in the mind of that counsel that the President was guilty of the crimes charged against him. Now, let us see how this letter originated.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me a moment?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODWARD. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in regard to the suspicion that Judge Black was in conspiracy with somebody, I wish to say that Judge Black is a man of the very highest honor and integrity, and that a conspiracy on his part with anybody is an impossible supposition, and especially a conspiracy with the gentleman from Massachusetts, with whom, I assure the House, Judge Black will enter into no conspiracy on any subject. The idea is preposterous. I beg my friend from Wisconsin not to entertain for one moment any such suspicion with regard to Judge Black.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If my friend from Pennsylvania had remained quiet for a moment I think he would have seen that I make no imputation upon Judge Black; nor do I enter into that question at all. I simply remark that there is a singular coincidence between the fact that he withdrew from the defense of the President at the time when he did, and that these letters from gentlemen having the management of the impeachment on the part of the House were, in view of the peculiar circumstances under which they were prepared, presented to the President just about the same time. Now, let us see whether the gentleman from Illinois is strictly correct.

If the House desires to adjourn I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no; I hope this matter will be settled to-night.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] claims that they had a right to write this letter at the particular time when it was written, and he says that he would do so again. And he tells us that the reason why he wrote that letter was to oblige his friend, Colonel Shaffer. Now, sir, that is in direct contradiction of the affidavit of Mr. Chauncey F. Black which was published in the Globe, and which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] introduced in the trial of the impeachment. Mr. Chauncey F. Black says, in his affidavit:

"As such counsel, we have argued the cause to the Secretary of State, and also to the President, before whom the question has been pending since July 19, 1867."

"We have in various forms pressed the matter upon his attention, and he has expressed himself fully and freely satisfied with the justice of the claims of our clients and his conviction of his own duty to afford the desired relief, but had declined to act because of the opposition of the Secretary of State."

He adds, in another passage:

"Learning from a mutual friend that it would be desirable for the President to receive the recommendations of other members of Congress, I carried a copy of the opinion to the House of Representatives and procured the signatures of some of my personal friends, and asked them to procure the signatures of others, which were attached to the copy."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears that Mr. Chauncey F. Black brought that letter here and procured signatures to it.

Mr. PILE. A copy of the letter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. A copy of the letter; it makes no difference. He brought the letter to the House of Representatives and procured signatures to it. He did not do it because Colonel Shaffer was a poor lawyer, as his friend, General BUTLER, would represent, not because he was not satisfied of the legality and justice of his case, but because he, Mr. Chauncey F. Black, understood that it would be desirable to the President to have members of Congress indorse this claim. That was the reason why he presented it. So that it appears from the affidavit itself that the object was to procure the signatures of members of Congress for the purpose of influencing the mind of the President. The affidavit shows that fact, and it shows that Mr. Chauncey F. Black procured the signatures, and not Colonel Shaffer. He says further:

"These signatures were procured upon personal application to the gentlemen severally, without any concert of action whatever on their part, and without any reference to any proceedings then pending in the then present action of Congress in regard to the President whatever."

That is equivalent to swearing that the signatures were procured at a time when the impeachment proceedings were pending, because he says the signatures were not procured with any reference to the then pending proceedings. This goes to show conclusively that the letters were obtained at the time when they bear date, the 9th of March.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes; I will hear the question.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like an answer to this question: If any gentleman asks you to sign a recommendation to the President of the United States to protect the rights of citizens of the United States by all the means consistent with the honor and dignity of the country will you refuse to sign it?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why, Mr. Speaker, it makes all the difference—

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, answer yes or no.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It makes all the difference in the world with what motive you sign any such paper, and it is that motive which it is desired by this investigation to ascertain, to see whether, as is charged in the country, these managers were influenced by corrupt and improper motives.

As I understand the Alta Vela case, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in his opinion represented only one class of citizens. Now, as I understand it, there are two classes of citizens, two sets of claimants to this island of Alta Vela. And, as I now understand it, the gentleman from Massachusetts was endeavoring to influence the President to interfere or interpose on behalf of those whom his friends represented. It is that fact which makes the signing of that letter either innocent or wrongful. It is that fact, the circumstances under which the letter was written, the purpose for which it was written, and the motive with which it was written, that gives character to the act, and that is what we desire to have ascertained by means of an investigating committee.

Mr. LOGAN. The purpose is to investigate whether there were corrupt motives or not. Now, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, as a member of this House and a gentleman, to state whether he charges that there were corrupt motives?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman had paid any attention to me he would understand that I do not undertake to impugn the motives of any man in this matter, neither do I upon any occasion make any such gross or ungentlemanly charges as are sometimes made by others upon this floor. I say that if the affidavit of Chauncey Black means anything at all, if he is entitled to any credit at all—and so far as the managers are concerned he is entitled to full credit, for he is their witness—it shows that these signatures were procured for the very purpose of operating upon the mind of the President. The President and the Secretary of State had the case before them; they had been considering it since July, 1867, and it was for the very purpose of influencing the President to act in accordance with the views of Judge Black and the party he represents that these signatures were procured, avowedly so.

Now, I care not what may be the character, or how high may be the position of Judge Black, I am not here to impugn or to defend him. I am not here to say that he is right and that the President is wrong in this matter. But I say that this matter, presented as it is, naturally raises a suspicion in the minds of the people and of all just men, that there is some connection between this letter and the action of Judge Black.

It has been put forth in the papers as a fact that Judge Black withdrew from the defense of the President because of a difference of opinion between him and the President upon the Alta Vela claim. Now, it may have been entirely right and proper that he should withdraw. I do not express any opinion upon that question at all. But here stand the two great facts, that after the President had been summoned to the bar of the Senate, while the proceeding of impeachment was pending against him, one of his principal counsel—one whom the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] says he would rather have defending the President than any pseudo-republican—withdraw from the defense of the President.

At the same time we find that four of the managers of this House had given opinions in accordance with the views entertained by Judge Black and his firm of lawyers in regard to this Alta Vela question. We find that they give the opinion that they are surprised that the President has not before this enforced the claim of the party represented by Judge Black upon the island of Alta Vela, with all the power and force consistent with the honor and dignity of this nation.

Now, if these facts taken in connection, taken together as they stand, are not enough to raise suspicion, then I would ask any gentleman what facts would raise a question in the minds of honest men? But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has gone even further. He tells us that this claim is so great, is of such vast importance, that the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania has passed a resolution indorsing it. He tells us, also, that the Legislature of the State of New Jersey has acted upon this claim, and by resolution has indorsed the validity of the position taken by the managers and by Judge Black and his firm of lawyers. How vast a claim must it then be that can exert such an influence in the country as this! How important a matter must it be, when it can command the influence of the House of Representatives or a portion of them, of a majority of the managers of impeachment, and obtain resolutions in its favor from the Legislatures of the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey!

Is it then a matter of such light importance? Is it a matter of such little moment? Is it a matter to be laughed off and trifled with as gentlemen would trifle with it? Why do they not tell us that they did not expect this letter was to go to the President? The gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY], who knows nothing about the matter, tells us that the letter is not addressed to the President; but no such defense as that has been put in by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] or the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] No such answer as that is made by either of the gentlemen.

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say that he is certainly mistaken. I said here in the presence of the House, and the gentleman heard it—whether he has forgotten it I do not know—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not yield to the gentleman any further.

Mr. LOGAN. I stated most emphatically that—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not yield to the gentleman. He never can be a gentleman in putting a question, and never can treat an opponent with any sort of courtesy. He never will be polite or civil. I do not wish, however, to do the gentleman any injustice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that to say of a member of the House that he "never can be a gentleman" is not parliamentary.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not say that, I believe.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not take any exception to the remark. You cannot expect anything else from a blackguard.

The SPEAKER. The remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is unparliamentary.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not take it back.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the Chair misunderstood me. At all events, I had no intention of making such a remark as the Chair has stated. I did not intend to do the gentleman from Illinois any injustice. If he did make the denial, it escaped my attention. But, sir, if the gentleman does deny it, we have the sworn affidavit of Mr. Chauncey F. Black that he procured the signatures, not for Colonel Chaffier, but for himself, and that he presented these signatures—

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to inquire whether that affidavit of Chauncey F. Black has not reference to the second letter, which contained a copy of the first, and not to the one signed by General LOGAN or General BUTLER.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir. I think it refers to both.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman will find, I think, if he reads the affidavit, that it refers only to the last letter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have read it, and I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] yield to me for a moment, that I may make a few remarks, and also send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from Judge Black?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in reference to my signature to this paper that I had seen the report in this case, (for there is a printed official report from the Secretary of State in regard to the island of Alta Vela), and either Mr. Black, junior, or Mr. Shaffer, or both together, (I forget which,) showed me an opinion written by General BUTLER and approved by General LOGAN, and asked me whether I felt at liberty to sign it. I glanced hastily over it and was of the opinion, as I still am, that it was good law, and I signed the paper. I cannot fix the date of that, but I am quite confident it was as early as, perhaps before, the 1st of March. But I am unable by any means to fix the date with precision. Some days after that (and I make this statement out of regard for two managers who are concerned in this case) a copy of that paper, which had been written by General BUTLER and signed by General LOGAN and myself, was brought to this House. Colonel Shaffer and Mr. Black, I think, were here together, and they, not having the privilege of the floor, asked me if I would not hand that to two or three gentlemen here for their signatures. I went to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM], a prominent man, and occupying a seat near the front, where the paper was given to me. I asked him to sign it. "What is it?" he said, in his apparently rather petulant way. I replied, "It is an opinion of General BUTLER in favor of asserting the right of some American citizens to a certain island." "Oh," said he, "you mean that Alta Vela matter; I do not know much about it." I let the paper lie on his table.

Probably in five minutes from that time I passed by there and said, "BINGHAM, have you signed that paper?" "Well, is it all right?" said he. "I think it is; I signed it myself," I replied; and he then signed his name. I should be surprised if Mr. BINGHAM, if he is not possessed of an extraordinary memory, would remember the transaction fifteen minutes.

I also passed the paper to Mr. STEVENS, who was sitting, I think, at the Clerk's desk. I said, "This is an opinion of General BUTLER, Mr. STEVENS, with regard to the claim of some of our citizens to an island." "Well," said he, "I know something about that; I think Seward has acted like a rascal," or some remark like that, [laughter,] and he signed the paper. That accounts for the signatures of the two managers; and so far from there being any concert of action, any purpose in that signing except such as appears on a hundred papers that are on the desks of members every month, I am perfectly clear—my mind could not be clearer on any subject—that those two gentlemen had no notion whatever, any more than I had or any other man had, that they were a party to any scheme.

Now, I have received a letter from Judge Black, dated the day before yesterday, and I will ask the Clerk to read it, and that will end all I have to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

YORK, April 23, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: The newspapers talk wildly about my retirement from the impeachment case. Some of them put Mr. Johnson in "the interesting predicament of an ill-used gentleman," because I am not defending him before the Senate. Mr. Nelson said very absurd things in his speech the other day. What is worse, they assert (by innuendo at least) that some of the Radicals in Congress had a mischievous purpose in expressing their opinion that justice ought to be done to the owners of Alta Vela. I want you to understand and remember two or three points.

1. I knew nothing about the paper until it went into the hands of the President. I never in my life spoke to any of the signers about the case except to you, and not to you until after the date of the paper.

2. You certainly could have had no design to make a breach between the President and me; for, when I told you that his conduct and the misconduct of Seward might compel me to decline acting as his counsel, you advised me not to decide hastily on a question of so much moment to my professional reputation.

3. I never saw or heard anything from which it could be inferred that you or any other member of Congress signed the paper in question for any reason except because it expressed your real convictions.

4. You know certainly that my retirement was not prompted by anybody. It was my own act, for which I alone am responsible, and it was done because I felt myself morally forced to it.

5. The story that I gave the President his choice between a decision of the Alta Vela case and the loss of my services as counsel is all false. From first to last I never asked him to do anything in it except on the ground of pure justice. I distinctly told him that I did not want it as a favor to me. When I found that Seward's policy was stronger than legal duty I was done. But Mr. Johnson did not know until he had given his last word that it would or might have the effect of dissolving our relations. I have nothing to say against the magnanimity and courage for which Mr. Nelson gives him credit, only this: that there was no necessity for showing those qualities to me; I did not put him to any test whatever.

I am, most respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. S. BLACK.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me one word more. The signatures that were added to the letter when the copy was in here were, so far as I know, all added within five minutes. At least I know of three signatures, the two that I have named and that of Mr. BLAINE, and they were added in the same unconcerted and hurried way in which we sign hundreds of papers here. I have had this letter read for a twofold purpose, for, whatever may be Judge Black's political opinions or his political status, I should feel myself very unworthy if I made an insinuation or, as far as I could help it, permitted an insinuation that he had done a dishonorable thing in this matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Can the gentleman state the date of that?

Mr. GARFIELD. The letter is dated the day before yesterday.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman said that all that occurred in the House in relation to the letter occurred within the space of five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I spoke of the signatures.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand that; but when was that?

Mr. GARFIELD. It was the copy bearing the same date as the original letter. It was some time in the month of March. I cannot tell the precise date. The original letter was copied entire, and the other signatures were added to the copy of the original letter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was this after the date that the copy bore?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it was about the 16th of March, but I cannot fix the precise date.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That corresponds with the statement of Mr. Chauncey F. Black, and his letter inclosing the copy with the additional signatures to the President would fix the date of the transaction.

Mr. BUTLER. Allow me to call your attention to that. He speaks not of the original letter, but of the copy, as you will see by his affidavit before you.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman may read it.

Mr. BUTLER. He says:

"Some considerable time after I had forwarded the original I sent this copy so signed to the President."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Now, the time when this copy was sent, I understand Chauncey F. Black in his affidavit to say, can be fixed by the date of the letter which inclosed that copy to the President.

Mr. BUTLER. The original?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No; he states it in reference to the copy, as the gentleman will find. I cannot be interrupted further. I think the gentleman will find it so on examination.

Now, I intend to make no insinuation against either of these managers. My personal relations with them are such that I have no desire to cast any imputation upon them. But here stands before the country a grave charge in regard to them. And I say the same thing in regard to Judge Black. I know him well; I would be as unwilling to believe any wrong of him as can be his friend from his own State, [Mr. WOODWARD.] Therefore, as I have before said, I make no charges against him. But here stands the fact before the country, in regard to which a committee of investigation can satisfy the country. Here stands the charge against the managers: four of the managers writing a letter to the President, or writing a letter which was sent to the President, insisting upon the legal right which Judge Black and his firm of lawyers were endeavoring to enforce; Judge Black and his firm of lawyers asked that a vessel of war should be sent to enforce the claim of the parties whom they represented.

Here is the letter written (the gentleman says he thinks it was written in February) bearing the date of March 9, in which language is used which means, if it means anything, that the President ought to have done precisely what Judge Black and his firm of lawyers claimed that he should do, to wit: to have enforced, by all the power at his command, consistent with the honor and dignity of the nation, this claim of these parties upon the island of Alta Vela. The claim of the lawyers and that of Mr. Manager BUTLER are identical; both insisting that the rights of these parties should be maintained by the power of the Government—by all its power; the one asking that a war vessel, and the other asking that all the power of the Government should be used to maintain the claim of these parties upon Alta Vela.

There also stands before the country the fact that Judge Black had been engaged as one of the counsel of the President; that for some reason, personal to himself, he deemed it proper to withdraw from the defense of the President. Now, it matters not whether Judge Black himself knew what was to be done with this letter, whether he had anything to do with procuring it, or whether it was procured by Colonel Shaffer, or the younger Mr. Black for the purpose of operating upon the mind of the President. In either case, if the managers knew that such use was to be made of the letter, then their motives would be such as have been charged against them. If they did not know it; if they did not write the letter for any such purpose, then why do they resist an investigation by a committee? Why do they shrink from that?

They need not charge, as was charged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] that this matter was dragged before the country and into the impeachment case by the President. That is not so. All know that the first intimation in reference to the Alta Vela case was contained in the charge made in the speech of Governor BOUTWELL, that the President had undertaken to ruin Judge Black, and drive him from the case. It therefore became necessary for Mr. Nelson to answer the charge thus made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman pair with me? I want to go away from here. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman always treats me with so much kindness and courtesy; he always expresses his opinions here with such a sweet and smiling face, and in such a kind manner that I am always willing to yield to anything he asks.

Sir, I say that this matter was dragged before the country by the managers themselves; for it is to be presumed that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and the other managers acted in concert in regard to the speeches which they put before the country; that Mr. BOUTWELL made such a speech as accorded with the views of the managers. This is the fair presumption; and it seems to me it should be the desire of every one of those managers that the facts should come out, that they may be exculpated from the charge which is made against them in the public prints.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in consequence of the interruptions I have experienced I have said much more than I had expected to say. Let me repeat, that there may be no mistake about this matter, that I have spoken from no personal ill-will toward any of the managers or toward Judge Black or toward any other person who may be connected with this case.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. ROSS. If the gentleman from New York will give way I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BROOKS. I prefer to go on now. Mr. Speaker, before I sit down, I desire to say a few words in reply to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] but in the first place I wish to refer briefly to the law bearing upon this case of Alta Vela. The act of August 18, 1856, contains this provision:

"That when any citizen or citizens of the United States may have discovered, or shall hereafter discover, a deposit of guano on any island, rock, or key not known within the lawful jurisdiction of any other Government, and not occupied by the citizens of any other Government, and shall take peaceable possession thereof, and occupy the same, said island, rock, or key may, at the discretion of the President of the United States, be considered as appertaining to the United States."

I also hold in my hand the acts of the republic of St. Domingo of 1844 and 1854. These two acts passed by that republic at two different times show clearly that this was not a newly-discovered island, but that it was recognized as within the legal jurisdiction of St. Domingo. The law of 1844 contains the following provision:

"ARTICLE 2. The province of Compostela de Azua is divided into nine communes, namely, Azua, (the capital of the province,) Neyba, San Juan, Hincha, Las Matas de Farfan, Banica, Caobas, San Rafael, and San Miguel. The military station of Barahona will be attached to the commune of Azua, as the nearest, and Petritu to that of Neyba. The adjacent islands depending on this province are Beata and Alta Vela."

In the law of 1854 it is provided as follows: "ARTICLE 4. The province of Compostela de Azua is divided into the following communes: Azua, (capital of the province,) Neyba, San Juan, Las Matas, Banica, Hincha, San Rafael, San Miguel, and Caobas. The military post of Barahona will depend upon the commune of Neyba. The adjacent islands depending on this province are Beata and Alta Vela."

Thus it clearly appears that these were not newly-discovered islands, but were islands annexed to the Government of St. Domingo and recognized as coming within its jurisdiction.

Now, sir, a few words in reply to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER,] who, as well as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has chosen to assail me for the part which I have taken in this debate. In bringing this matter to the attention of the House I was actuated by good motives. I had no design to cast any imputation upon either of those honorable gentlemen, but simply to demand an inquiry. I did not expect to draw from those gentlemen, and particularly the gentleman from Massachusetts, the volley of abuse to which it is impossible for me, having due regard for the amenities of debate, and the proprieties of this honorable body, to reply as it deserves. Such language, uttered in debate here, is more discreditable, if possible, to the House of Representatives than it is to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. I can see no reason why this question relating to the conduct of the managers should not have been properly met, instead of being made the occasion for denouncing me and bringing into this discussion matters which have no connection whatever with the question under consideration.

Sir, I never allow myself, unless provoked, to enter into any discussion of this sort with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts or the honorable gentleman from Illinois or any other gentleman; I was not educated in any such school of debate. I have been taught to have more respect for the proprieties of this House and the proprieties of social and public intercourse than to enter into any such discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. While I was in the military service of the country, did not the gentleman arise here and accuse me of being a "gold robber?"

Mr. BROOKS. I did; and it is because I did arise and on this floor accuse the gentleman of being a "gold robber" (and the fact was substantially established in the courts of New York) that he pursues me with the fire and fury exhibited upon all occasions when he and I come in conflict.

Sir, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts will never, never forgive me because I extorted from him, or was the means of extorting from him through the Treasury Department here and through the courts in New York $60,000 in gold which he had extorted from a New Yorker in New Orleans, when he had command there—a sum of money which he was obliged by the courts of New York to pay back, not exactly in the gold which he appropriated in New Orleans when it was at $2 80, but in paper as legal tender. It is because of this act of mine upon the floor of this House when he was a commanding general and I as a public man exposed his acts here, that I am assailed, as I have been by him to-day, and upon other occasions elsewhere.

Sir, as a member of Congress upon the floor of this House when the subject-matter of the war was under discussion I had a parliamentary right to allude to the whole course of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts and to dwell upon all his actions in New Orleans and elsewhere. He first, in order to deter me, sent an aid-de-camp of his, with epaulets, to my private chamber with a letter threatening me with something or other if I did not retract what I had then uttered; and because I chose to call the attention of the House to the subject of that letter, here, elsewhere, everywhere he has pursued me with volleys of abuse, with vituperation, with words and language of a character which I cannot properly here describe, but which would better befit Newgate or Billingsgate than the House of Representatives of the United States, and would better befit a representative from Billingsgate than a Representative from old Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that that remark is unparliamentary and out of order.

Mr. BROOKS. Billingsgate out of order! Why it is a gate in the city of London.

The SPEAKER. It is unparliamentary as applied by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BUTLER. Then he did not mean it as uncomplimentary.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield, of course, to the admonition of the Chair.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to ask, if my colleague will allow me a moment, if the assertion made by my colleague was thoroughly understood by the Chair? It was not directed—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the gentleman that having made a decision it is presumed by all the members that he thoroughly understands it. If that decision is appealed from—

Mr. CHANLER. I do appeal from it, and I wish to make a statement.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, no.

Mr. CHANLER. It is simply this: the application was not to the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Cries of "Order."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. The Chair decides that the remark made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] in the presence of the House, was unparliamentary. From this decision the gentleman's colleague appeals.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. BROOKS. Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to punish me for this discussion two Congresses since, has entered upon the subject of a lawsuit which I had in the courts of New York and which was amicably settled between the parties to the perfect satisfaction of all sides. Whatsoever he has stated here as fact has not even the merit of imagination and does not approach the domain of fact, and is not only without truth but is the very apogee and perigee from the truth in all respects whatsoever. But no matter what my lawsuits and controversies, I shall not choose to allude to his history in Massachusetts and elsewhere. I will not obtrude private affairs like that upon this House. My record is before my own people, my country, and my countrymen, and my people at home have sent me here by majorities of thousands; the most intelligent, the best educated, the most religious, the most cultivated, and the wealthiest of the districts of New York has indorsed my course and my character again and again, and I stand upon my constituency and upon that jury at home in utter refutation of whatever charges the honorable gentleman may choose to make against me without going into any particulars therefor.

I might if I chose enter into his history. Of what use would it be to me, when you often hear these things uttered to proclaim the glories of Big Bethel in his ear? [Laughter.] The gentleman is distinguished in war as in the arts of peace. Of what use would it be for me to speak of the "beauty and booty" of New Orleans, particularly of the booty of New Orleans which was of far more importance in his estimation than the beauty of New Orleans. I might dwell upon the "concussion" at Fort Fisher.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the gentleman from New York that the question before the House is the resolution introduced by himself in regard to Alta Vela, and the Chair does not see exactly what this has to do with that.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, if the Chair had not been able to see it in the course of the discussion when the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] alluded to a certain law suit of mine, I would be quite able to appreciate the inability of the Chair to see it now.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] casts an imputation upon the Chair, and intimates that he has not been fair in the decision which he has made, the Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] were in regard to legal opinions, which the gentleman from New York knows very well.

The gentleman from New York arraigned the gentleman from Massachusetts for signing a legal opinion. The gentleman from Massachusetts said that he had signed a legal opinion, though he sometimes refused to sign legal opinions in particular cases to which he referred. And he cited a particular case in which he refused to sign an opinion. He made no direct reference to the gentleman from New York, though he did use some language in regard to the parties in that case which may have had some connection with the gentleman. But the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as the gentleman from New York will find, if he reads the Globe, did not relate directly or in any offensive manner to the gentleman from New York. In admitting those remarks the Chair supposed he was stretching the rule quite as far as it could be stretched; but they were certainly legitimate in that line of argument. And if the gentleman from New York will now trace any connection between the remarks he was making about "beauty and booty" and the Alta Vela case and the conduct of the managers, the Chair will willingly modify or change his ruling.

Mr. BROOKS. The whole matter is a very dirty affair, relating to guano, as the gentleman from Massachusetts remarked while upon the floor. But under the ruling of the Chair—and I have no doubt the Chair is discharging to the best of his ability the duty incumbent upon him, to preserve order and decorum in this House—I have very little remedy for any personal attack made upon me here or elsewhere.

The gentleman from Massachusetts is not amenable either to the laws of debate or to the laws of courtesy. But I might do as he has done, perhaps. I might say that I, not as a lawyer, but as a journalist, having reference to journalistic matters connected with Alta Vela as a subject of public discussion, have been called upon to give an opinion in reference to some matters in connection with it.

And if I undertake to enter into that discussion I hope the Chair will observe carefully what I am saying and keep me within due bounds of order. I will say that there was a certain case in the State of Massachusetts where an honorable gentleman had come home from the glories of war, illustrious and renowned, with the keys of Richmond in his pocket, elevated, ennobled, and aggrandized by the glorious victories which he had won over the enemies of his country; yet he was attacked there by a common bricklayer for an onslaught upon him and soundly thrashed therefor. As he is capable of submitting patiently to a thrashing like that, I have no occasion here or elsewhere to vindicate myself from the personal assaults and attacks which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] makes upon me here.

Sir, no man can deprecate more than I these discourtesies of debate; and those who have observed my course in this House for years past will bear me witness that I never indulge in them unless I am provoked. But I allow no gentleman—no honorable or dishonorable gentleman—in any species of debate, unprovoked by any personal allusion from me, to attack me without using all the talents which God has given me in vindication of myself and in the way of proper retort.

I hope that now the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts is satisfied with the vengeance he has had for the exposure which I made of a gold transaction in the city of New Orleans. Wealthy as he is, abounding in all the resources of fortune, enjoying all the blessings of this life, and with, I trust, an anticipation of enjoying those of the life to come, he will, I hope, forgive me for having been the instrument of taking from his pocket, or from some one's pocket where he had deposited it, this large sum of money, and will no longer pursue this course of personal retort and vengeance upon me whenever an opportunity arises.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that this whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it not be in order to refer the subject to a committee?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order pending the motion to lay on the table, which has priority even of the previous question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—aye 67, noes 25, not voting 97; as follows:

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at six minutes past three o'clock p. m.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in some amendments and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURNE of Illinois, Mr. N. P. BANKS of Massachusetts, and Mr. CHARLES E. PHELPS of Maryland, the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senate will act on that matter now and appoint a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate now proceed to consider the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider their amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to hear the amendments disagreed to by the House read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the Senate disagreed to by the House; which was to strike out the proviso commencing in line six and ending in line thirteen, as follows:

Provided, That all moneys now under the control, or subject to the order of the Secretary of the Navy, whether arising from appropriations or from sales of public property, or otherwise, which shall be unexpended on the 1st day of July, 1868, shall be covered into the Treasury, so that no amount hereby appropriated shall be expended or drawn while any other unexpended moneys shall be subject to the order of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that the only amendment to which the House disagree?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the first of the amendments disagreed to. The question is on concurring in the action of the House on that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, and others. By the Chair.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to know what has become of the other amendments?

Mr. SHERMAN. They all go together.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understood the motion was in reference to one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was that the Senate insist on all its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that conference is appointed I should like to have those amendments read, so that we may know what they are about. We may be able to agree to all except one or two of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the Senate to which the House disagreed was to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the civil engineer and naval storekeeper at the several navy-yards, and that the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boat-builders, master sparmakers, master blockmakers, and the superintendents of rope walks, shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the conference, and unless other Senators want the other amendments read, I do not call for their reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendments will be dispensed with unless called for by some Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not like that system of legislation which refers a question to a committee of conference without its being considered at all in the Senate. I think there ought really to be a disagreement before a conference committee is raised, and the judgment of the Senate ought to be to some extent ascertained.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told they are all amendments made by the Senate to which the House have disagreed. Consequently, we have acted upon the amendments themselves seriatim.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My object in rising was to say that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. GRIMES] seems not to be here this evening, and this bill ought not to be considered in his absence. I do not agree that the whole of these amendments shall be referred to a committee of conference until the Senate has considered them; and I think we ought to adjourn and let this bill come up in its regular order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I thought the Senate had agreed to the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. CONKLING. So it did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did, and there is nothing before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that is so, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate except the appointment of the committee of conference, which will consist of Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. CONKLING, and Mr. GRIMES.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 2, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence, for an indefinite time, was granted to Mr. GLOSBERNER, on account of the death of a member of his family.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of James W. Taylor on the mineral resources of the States and Territories east of the Rocky mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that five thousand extra copies of this report be printed for the use of the members of this House.

The motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

ELECTION IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the General of the Army be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the number of votes cast for and against the State constitution at the recent election in Arkansas.

MRS. KEZIE HOLMAN.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1034) granting a pension to Mrs. Kezie Holman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JAMES L. KIERNAN.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be hereby instructed to examine the claim of James L. Kiernan, for services and expenses due him as consul at Chin-Kiang, in China, and report to this House by bill or otherwise, and that the accompanying papers be referred to the said committee.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At three o'clock and ten minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock m.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask unanimous consent of the House for a personal explanation. No objection was made.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask the Chair if there can be legislation? The SPEAKER. There cannot.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not ask legislation. The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose and asked the consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was notice given of this proceeding?

The SPEAKER. There was not, but no business is to be transacted. It is something personal to the gentleman.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Very possibly the gentleman's remarks may relate to some gentleman who is not in the House and who is not here, because it was not expected that any business would be done.

Mr. DONNELLY. It is not a matter of business. It is a matter affecting my own personal reputation. I desire to answer an assault made upon me by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in one of the papers of my own State. It is a matter affecting me alone, and I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not, provided the gentleman will give the House notice of what time he expects to occupy, for as this is Saturday afternoon we all expected an early adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is familiar with the rule. The gentleman has the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation. The Chair stated the question and waited the usual time and no objection was made.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, on the 20th of March last, I asked in this House unanimous consent to introduce a bill for a land grant to aid in the construction of a railroad from the town of Taylor's Falls, in the State of Minnesota, by the way of St. Cloud to the western boundary of the State; and asked that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and printed. An objection was made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I did not hear any other objection at the time. It seems, however, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had also objected. I immediately went to the gentleman from Illinois and said to him that I was about to leave the city to go to the State of Connecticut to labor in behalf of the Republican party in that State, that I must leave the next day, and that I would be obliged to him as a personal favor if he would withdraw his objection and permit me to introduce the bill. His answer to me was, "Mr. HOLMAN has objected." Taking it for granted that he meant that he would not press his objection I went to Mr. HOLMAN. I made the same statement to him, and, although opposed to me in politics, he was still gentleman enough to say that he would not attempt to interfere with the mere introduction of the bill, and he rose, as you will recollect, Mr. Speaker, and said that although opposed to land grants, he was not opposed to the introduction and reference of the bill, and withdrew his objection. The Speaker again put the question, and stated that the bill would have its first and second readings, when the gentleman from Illinois rose in his seat and said, "I also object," and it was impossible for me to introduce the bill. I was filled, as any gentleman would be, with indignation at this course, at this seeming ill faith, and I sat down and wrote a letter to the gentleman most interested in that project, and who had written to me upon the subject, and stated merely the facts. I send that letter to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. W. H. C. FOLSOM, Taylor's Falls, Minnesota:

I have carefully prepared a bill for a grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of a railroad "from Taylor's Falls, via St. Cloud, to the western boundary of the State," as will appear by a copy of the Globe, which I will send you tomorrow. Mr. E. B. WASHBURN, of Illinois, twice objected, and prevented its introduction and reference to the Committee on Public Lands. As unanimous consent was necessary, the objection made by Mr. WASHBURN has delayed for the present all action upon the bill. I fear that this delay will throw the bill forward to a very late period in the session.

The introduction and reference of bills are so much "matters of course" in parliamentary proceedings, that I am at a loss to account for this action of Mr. WASHBURN. I should regret to think that his continual opposition to every measure of public and private nature in which I appear to be interested is due to a desire to utterly impair my ability to serve my constituents. I can scarcely think it possible for any respectable gentleman to indulge in such an illiberal and ungenerous policy; but the fact remains that he seems determined to resist in every way every measure which I deem important to my constituents. I propose to do my whole duty in spite of his opposition.

Truly, your friend,

I. DONNELLY

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, that letter, it seems, was printed in the local paper of the locality in question, and from that was disseminated over the entire State. It also seems that the gentleman from Illinois has in my district a brother who has been laboring for years to supplant me here in my seat in this body and come here as a member of Congress. The newspapers of the State, in commenting upon this action of the gentleman from Illinois, reflected somewhat upon the gentleman's brother. The result was that the gentleman from Illinois wrote and sent to one of the prominent papers of my State, the St. Paul Press, a letter which I undertake to say is without a parallel in the history of this Congress, without a parallel in the history of any parliamentary body on the face of the earth—a letter so shocking, so abusive, so outrageous in its character and in all its parts that I should hesitate to offend the ears of this body with the reading of it, did I not feel that justice to my own reputation demands it. I ask the Clerk to read the letter, which I now send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1868.

DEAR SIR: Some one has sent me a Minnesota newspaper containing a letter addressed to you by Mr. "I. DONNELLY." This Mr. "I. DONNELLY," seems to be in search of sympathy from his constituents, by making a whining complaint against me for objecting to the introducing of some bill which he pretended to be anxious to get before the House. He must place a very low estimate upon the intelligence of his constituents if he does not suppose they could see through his shallow device to make a little local capital under a pretense thoroughly false.

He says he had prepared a bill for a grant of land to construct a railroad "from Taylor's Falls, via St. Cloud, to the western boundary of the State," and that he attempted to introduce it into the House, and that I objected to it, and which objection he says "delayed for the present all action on the bill."

As he has addressed you on the subject, I will ask you to look, for a moment, at this jesuitical performance of your member in this regard. He knew, in the first place, that there was not the ghost of a chance for the passage of any such bill; and, in the second place, if such a bill should pass there would be little, if any, land between Taylor's Falls and St. Cloud to go to the State under the proposed grant, as nearly all the land is either taken up or included in former grants. And what would seem strange in the light of this extraordinary letter in regard to this very important matter, is that your member should have delayed the introduction of his bill for the long period of four months, for he could have introduced it, under the rules, on every Monday since Congress met, which was on the 21st day of November last. But he failed to bring it in until the 20th day of last month, when he attempted to get it in out of order. This was on Friday. On the succeeding Monday, the 23d ultimo, Minnesota was called for the introduction of bills, under which call this very bill could have been introduced by your member, regardless of any and all objections by myself or by any one else. But what will a constituency think of a Representative who, after parading before them the grievance that I objected to his introduction of his bill on Friday, the 20th of March, failed to introduce the same bill on Monday, the 23d of March, when there could have been no objection to it. As to the "delay" he speaks of, which will throw "the bill forward to a very late period in the session," it will be perceived that he alone is responsible for it.

The exploits of your member in this matter are akin to another jesuitical performance of his in the same line. On the 27th of January last he introduced a bill into the House granting, as I understand, (I have not seen the bill) two hundred thousand acres of land to improve the Mississippi river between St. Paul and Minneapolis. The object of this action undoubtedly was to antagonize this proposition to grant land for this purpose (a proposition almost unprecedented, and which he knew Congress would never agree to) with a proposition before the Committee on Commerce to make an appropriation of money for that purpose. By these means he supposed he might defeat aid for the object, and then have another opportunity to attribute the failure to me, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

How contemptible must any Representative of an intelligent and patriotic constituency appear, when found guilty of such a scandalous attempt to impose upon them!

Mr. DONNELLY says he is at a loss to account for my action in objecting to his bill, and he evidently intends to convey the idea that my official action is hostile to the interests of your State. I objected to the bill not only because he attempted to introduce it out of order, but I objected to it for the reason that from my knowledge of his character, and from his connection with legislation here, I have become extremely suspicious of everything that he proposes. And when your member arraigns me for hostility to the interests of your noble State, he seems to forget, what is known to all your older settlers, that I labored here for the interests of your State, by both voice and vote, long before he left Philadelphia, under suspicious circumstances, between two days, and long before he changed his name and politics; the latter from a Buchanan Locofoco to a Republican, and made his advent in Minnesota as an office beggar. It is not my opposition to Minnesota interests that excites the hostility of your member. It is my opposition to his schemes of plunder and aggrandizement that lead him to assail me. My congressional record for sixteen years is open to the public, and I challenge its severest scrutiny. I trust it will not be found to be stained with venality, corruption, and crime. I commend the examination of the record of your member to his constituents, and if they do not find that every corrupt, extravagant, and profligate measure ever brought before the House has received his support I will acknowledge myself mistaken.

It might be well for the constituents of your member to inquire what was his action in the matter of legalizing by act of Congress that most serious obstruction to the free navigation of the Mississippi river, the Clinton bridge? This bridge has been the means of inflicting untold injury upon the commerce and people of the upper Mississippi. It has been the terror of all lumbermen of Minnesota, and they have been damaged in various ways by the obstruction of the Clinton and Rock Island bridges hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars. Indeed, it is safe to say that the damage done by the breaking up of rafts, the increased expense of running them, on account of the danger of passing these bridges, the increased price of freight and insurance on account of the bridges, costs the people of Minnesota $500,000 a year. When the bill came up in the House to legalize the Clinton bridge and make it a post road, and was pressed to its passage by the unscrupulous agents of the corrupt railroad monopolies, whose object was to so impede the free navigation of the Mississippi as to compel their farmers to ship their products east over railroads at a vastly enhanced rate of freight, I resisted the passage of the bill in the interest of your people and the people of the upper Mississippi with all my might. The day before the bill passed Mr. DONNELLY voluntarily came to my seat and assured me of his hearty support, and urged me to keep up a vigorous opposition. You can well conceive my surprise and indignation the next day on finding him voting for the bill. I could only account for his sudden conversion on the hypothesis that he had been "seen" during the previous night. You know something of the Union Pacific railroad, which is likely to become one of the most monstrous monopolies the world has ever known. Though built by a subsidy from the Government, the oppressions and extortions of the company practiced upon the people have excited universal indignation. Mr. WINDOM, of your State, introduced two or three months since a joint resolution creating a board to limit the rate of passage and freight over this road. Passengers are now charged ten cents per mile fare, and freight is charged at the rate of fifteen cents per mile per ton. Mr. I. DONNELLY voted to lay this joint resolution upon the table. With a free annual pass over the road in his own pocket, he was willing to see every constituent of his who traveled over the road charged ten cents a mile fare.

I beg leave to commend your attention to another matter deeply affecting your member and the interests of your State. His predecessor, the ever faithful representative of Minnesota interests, Colonel Aldrich, by persistent effort, in conjunction with his colleague, Mr. WINDOM, secured an amendment to the Union Pacific railroad bill, which compelled the building of a road west from Sioux City to join the Union Pacific, which would have brought the head of Lake Superior one hundred miles nearer to the point of junction than Chicago. Yet it was stated in the House the other day by Mr. ALLISON, of Iowa, and it has not since been denied, that this Minnesota member secured a change in the law, by which the Union Pacific railroad was released from its obligation to build this branch, and a transfer to another company made, which other company built a road down the valley of the Missouri river, and has received over one million dollars in violation of law. Holding the important position he has occupied on the Pacific Railroad Committee, the constituents of the member will probably desire to be informed touching the consideration which induced this wanton betrayal of their interests.

But I have neither time nor inclination to pursue this matter further. Perhaps I should not now have taken this trouble had this been the first time your member, without any provocation whatever, had seen fit to send attacks upon me to his constituents. Instead of making his complaints here, with a degree of cowardice only equaled by his mendacity, he parades himself, like a whipped school-boy, before his constituents, and whines at me because I exercised a parliamentary right in objecting to the introduction of one of his bills into the House out of order. I need add nothing further.

Yours, respectfully, E. B. WASHBURN.

Hon. W. H. C. FOLSOM, Taylor's Falls, Minnesota.

P. S.—Papers in Minnesota that have published Mr. DONNELLY's letter are requested to publish this.

Mr. DONNELLY: Mr. Speaker, I think I am justified in the declaration I have made, that the annals of this Congress present no parallel to that letter. I think I shall establish here that there are in that letter twenty-three distinct statements which are twenty-three distinct falsehoods. I shall attempt to deal with them just as rapidly as possible, for my time is limited.

First, as to the introduction of this bill. I have here in my hand the letter of Mr. Folsom, inclosing the original draft of the bill, an imperfect copy, which I was obliged afterward to mature and write out in full. That letter is dated February 19, 1868. It came here while I was absent in the State of New Hampshire. Upon my return on the 1st of March I was here but twenty days before I again left the city to take part in the canvass in the State of Connecticut. During those twenty days I had upon my hands the entire accumulated business of the time that I had been absent. As rapidly as possible I got through it. I rewrote this bill; I endeavored to introduce and have it referred on the 20th of March. So much for the statement that I could have introduced the bill at any time since the commencement of the session.

Secondly, as to the statement that I could have introduced it upon the 23d of March, the succeeding Monday. I was then in the State of Connecticut. And, sir, the Journal of the House will show that at the date of the writing of that letter, the 10th of that month, there had not been a single call of the States for the introduction of bills; so that it was beyond my power to introduce it but by the consent of the gentleman from Illinois.

Next, as to the statement that there is no land in this bill. I had supposed, Mr. Speaker, for I am of a merciful temper, that the gentleman's discourtesy had been dictated by some devotion to the public interest and had grown out of his abhorrence of land grants. I was willing to make in my own heart that excuse for the gentleman, but he tells us in that letter that he believed that that bill contained no land. I knew, Mr. Speaker, that on the subject of land grants the gentleman seems to have a very delirium tremens of economy; that he sees rats and snakes in everything; and that no wood-pile, however innocent, can be constructed that the gentleman does not see beneath it the form of a colored man. But in this case he tells us that he knew or believed that there was no land involved in that bill. Why, then, did he object to its introduction, if it was a mere mass of verbiage? If it gave nothing, if it included nothing, his objection must have sprung from personal and malicious motives. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman cannot speak the truth, even when the truth would best serve his purpose. As to that declaration that there is no land involved in that bill, I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 29, 1868.

SIR: In compliance with your request of yesterday, I have estimated the amount of vacant and unappropriated public lands designated by odd numbers within twenty miles on each side of a line from Taylor's Falls, via St. Cloud and Alexandria, to Georgetown, on the Red River of the North, and find about nine hundred and fifty thousand acres of this class of lands.

Very respectfully,

JOS. S. WILSON, Commissioner.

Hon. IGNATIUS DONNELLY, House of Representatives.

Mr. DONNELLY. Thus it appears, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois came within about a million acres of the truth. So much for that branch of the subject.

I turn to the second question, the charge that I have been false to my constituents in reference to a measure for the improvement of the innavigable waters of the Mississippi river between the city of St. Paul and the city of Minneapolis, in my district. The charge, you remember, which has just been read in your hearing, is that the gentleman was ready to make an appropriation in money for that great work of internal improvement that would connect the navigable waters of the Mississippi with the great water-power of St. Anthony; and that I falsely and treacherously had introduced a bill for a land grant to prevent him from carrying through that work. Mr. Speaker, I propose to have the Clerk read at the desk a letter from the Postmaster of the House of Representatives in reference to that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request I beg leave to state that in the month of December last, soon after the reassembling of Congress, I had a conversation with Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, of Illinois, with reference to the probability of procuring, through the recommendation of the Committee of Commerce, of which he is chairman, an appropriation of money for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river between Fort Snelling and the Falls of St. Anthony.

In that conversation Mr. WASHBURN stated to me in the most emphatic manner that he was opposed to giving "one cent" for such purposes, unless it might be for the improvement of the "lower rapids," which he regarded as a national matter, stating at the same time that the financial condition of the country would not justify such appropriations, &c.

The result of this interview I at once communicated to you, and it was upon my advice that you introduced a bill for a grant of land to aid in making the improvement referred to, both of us believing there would be less objection to a land than to a money grant, and that a money grant was hardly possible in view of the opposition of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

You are aware, of course, that, as an officer of the House, I have no desire to take any part in personal controversies between members of the House, but I cannot refuse, in justice to you, to answer your inquiry, as I have in the foregoing statement.

Very respectfully, &c.,

WILLIAM S. KING.

Hon. I. DONNELLY, House of Representatives.

Mr. DONNELLY. That letter tells the whole story. Coming here, disposed to obtain, if possible, a money grant for that work, I was met by the emphatic declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] from which committee such a report must emanate, that he would not give one cent for that purpose.

Then on the 27th of January last I fell back upon a proposition for a land grant; I introduced a bill for that purpose, and the Committee on the Public Lands approved of that bill, and are now ready to report in its favor as soon as they can be heard.

And then another party enters this drama. The gentleman from Wisconsin, from the La Crosse district, [Mr. WASHBURN,] the brother of the gentleman from Illinois, mousing around, and discovering that this committee were prepared to report such a bill—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] that such language is not parliamentary when addressed toward a member who is absent; and who is not, at least directly, involved in this controversy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the party will be allowed to go on.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will say, then, Mr. Speaker, "making inquiry;" for I will change my language, as I have no desire to use any words which may offend the sense of decorum of this House—making inquiry, and discovering that the committee were prepared to report in favor of this bill a grant of two hundred thousand acres of land in the State of Minnesota; he then, in my absence from this city, while I was doing my part in the State of Connecticut, or the State of New Hampshire, I now forget which, for the success of the party in which this side of the House believe—the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] entered into my district and without notice to or any consultation with me, after first soliciting my colleague [Mr. WINDOM] to introduce it, who refused, he then introduced a bill for a money grant for the improvement of an innavigable portion of the Mississippi river, surrounded on both sides by the territory of my district. Sir, if there was any bad faith here; if there was any attempt to prevent the passage of any appropriation; if there was any attempt to impede my efficacy here, and to compel the people of my district to send some other individual in my place, that bad faith surely does not emanate from me. The record is conclusive—the refusal to appropriate money and the fact that I only sought a land grant when I found a money grant was impossible. So much for that branch of the subject.

I turn now to the question in reference to the Clinton bridge. The gentleman states that I came to him and said to him that I was in favor of his course in that matter and told him to stand firm. Mr. Speaker, the history of that matter is simply this: one day in July, 1866, as I passed the gentleman's desk he stopped me and entered into a tirade against that bridge, and told me it would be destructive to the lumber interest of my region; and I assented to his statement. The bill came up next day—on the 13th of July, 1866—and I voted with the gentleman. The bill to legalize that bridge and make it a post road was defeated. Six months afterward, in the next session of Congress, the subject again came up. In the mean time I had been home among my constituents. I had given the matter reflection. I discovered that the gentleman from Illinois was opposed to all bridges across the Mississippi river into the State of Wisconsin. I discovered that his purpose was to compel the great grain trade of my State to go down the valley of the Mississippi, to pour its abundant stores, or some portion of them, into the lap of the district represented by the gentleman.

I discovered another thing, that the Mississippi river was the eastern boundary of my State, that we exported fifteen million bushels of wheat annually, that at least twelve million of those bushels sought their way by the most direct route to Chicago and Milwaukee, and that if there were no bridges across the Mississippi river that wheat would have to be re-handled, taken from the cars and put on boats and reloaded on the other bank of the river, which could not be done for less than three cents a bushel, making an aggregate in amount of $360,000 per annum—an amount as great as the entire tax paid by the people of my State, an amount that in ten years would run up to $3,600,000. This upon our present crop; but we are growing at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum. In ten years the annual tax so inflicted upon our crops would be equal to $3,000,000, taken right out of the pockets of our farming community, our grain raisers.

The bill came up again in the next Congress. I heard the discussion. It was sustained by some of the leading men in this House: by Messrs. Alley of Massachusetts, Davis of New York, SCOFIELD of Pennsylvania, Farquhar of Indiana, and PRICE of Iowa. The vote on the passage of the bill stood 101 to 43. I voted for the measure. I so voted because I believed it was my duty to my constituents. I never supposed that any man would attempt to charge me with corruption upon such a vote as that. I knew, Mr. Speaker, that when my State asked for a bridge to the city of Winona across that river the gentleman from Illinois opposed it. The vote was 80 to 34. He spoke against it; he voted against it. The only exception in which the gentleman has not opposed bridges here was, I believe, the case of the bridge at La Crosse, where the gentleman's brother resides.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to these millions of dollars of damages that have been inflicted by that bridge I can only turn to my distinguished and honored friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] who is here present, and who lives within forty or fifty miles of that bridge, and who tells me that from the day we passed that bill to the present time he has never heard of one instance where any damage has been inflicted by that bridge upon rafts or boats or merchandise. So much for that point.

I turn now to the Union Pacific railroad resolution. I find I have not time to read extracts from the law. I will tell the House what it was and leave it for further discussion to prove whether I speak truly or not. When this Congress passed the great Union Pacific railroad bill, they provided that whenever the entire line of the Pacific railroad was built, and it was apparent that the road was yielding ten per cent. on its capital stock over and above all expenses, then, and not till then, Congress might have the right to reduce or regulate the tariff of fares and charges upon that road. The Union Pacific railroad is not yet built; is not yet constructed. It will not be constructed probably until the Forty-Second or perhaps the Forty-Third Congress meets here.

And what is the proposition of which we have heard so much on this floor? Why, sir, it is to take out of the hands of the Forty-Second or the Forty-Third Congress that right which alone belongs to them under that law, and put it into the hands of three Cabinet ministers. What is the imputation? Why, that it is easier to buy up this entire Congress, in both its branches, than these three men who may then sit in the Cabinet. What right have we to anticipate the legislation of the future? What right have we to divest our Congress of this right, and do it before the road is completed, before we have any evidence that that entire road will yield ten per cent. over and above all expenses? I voted against it, and I did so boldly, fearing no man's insinuations.

Sir, I believed it to be one of the spasmodic outbursts of the gentleman which we have witnessed here Congress after Congress. Why, sir, I can look back and recall how at the opening of almost every Congress the gentleman has got up here, and—if the word was parliamentary I would say—howled against the railroad communication between New York and this city, and demanded an air-line railroad, splitting the very heavens with his outcries. Suddenly there came a dead calm,

"And silence, like a poultice, came
To heal the wounds of sound,"

and we heard no more upon the subject until the next Congress met.

But he says I voted for this because I held an annual pass over the road. Ah! Mr. Speaker, this is almost too much for human contempt to reach. An annual pass upon a road that I have never seen; over which I have never traveled a mile; over which I do not expect to travel until that great day when a line of railroad communication shall extend unbroken from New York to San Francisco! On that day, standing on the Pacific coast, in sight of the Golden Gate, looking back over that mighty work, wedding in everlasting marriage the mightiest oceans of the globe, spanning the continent as God's great bow of promise spans the heaven, the glory of our nation, the marvel of our age, it will then, Mr. Speaker, be a consolation to know that that mighty work has been resisted and opposed by every blatant, loud-voiced, big-chested, small-headed, bitter-hearted demagogue in all this land.

I turn now to the Sioux City branch railroad charge. The charge is that I was false to my constituents, and destroyed their connection with the great Union Pacific railroad by wiping out that branch. Let me answer that as briefly as I may.

When I was in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and by your kindness, Mr. Speaker, a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, a proposition came before that committee presented by a gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HUBBARD, who lived at Sioux City, to turn that great branch, the Sioux City branch of the Union Pacific railroad, up the Niobrara river, in a westerly or northwesterly direction. If that bill had passed our people in that region never would have had any connection with the Union Pacific railroad. When they arrived at Sioux City they would find the railroad running up the valley of the Niobrara, and ending in the sand hills and sand plains which Mullins described in his wagon-road report. I resisted that; I prevented it. An amendment was got through, which, when you analyze it, (and I stand ready to analyze it to its narrowest confines, if the patience of this House would permit,) simply provided that, instead of the Union Pacific Railroad Company building that branch, any other company, to be selected by President Lincoln, might build it. It made no change in the route. It expressly provided that there should be no more expense; and the building of the branch was given to a company to be selected by the great and good man I have named. He selected a company, and that company built the road; so that now when a citizen of Minnesota reaches Sioux City he is in railroad communication with the Union Pacific railroad. That was the whole extent of the legislation. It did not change the route. An examination of the words of the law will show that. I would gladly yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] for his statement in reference to this subject; but as my time is limited I would be glad to hear his statement after I take my seat. The sole change was the change of the company. Instead of involving the Government in "millions of dollars of expense," that legislation saved the Government $3,200,000, which would have been expended if the road had run in a more westerly direction, and for two hundred miles further.

One word, Mr. Speaker, as to the charge contained in my letter to Mr. Folsom, that this gentleman had opposed every measure in which my State was interested. When we asked for a land grant for the Northern Pacific railroad, a great enterprise most dear to our people, the gentleman opposed us and voted to lay our bill upon the table. At one time he helped to defeat it, and it was finally passed over his opposition. When we asked for a subsidy for that road he opposed the proposition, making a violent speech against it and denouncing it on the floor of this House. When our land-grant railroads came here and asked for an extension on account of the war, the gentleman resisted that measure also and voted against it. Instead of having to-day four hundred miles of railroad and four hundred thousand people in the State of Minnesota, if the gentleman's policy had prevailed, we should not have to-day fifty miles of railroad nor two hundred thousand people. So much for the gentleman's devotion to our "noble young State."

But he says I am "an office-beggar." "An office-beggar!" and this from a gentleman bearing the name that he does! Et tu Brute! "An office-beggar!" Why, Mr. Speaker, when I entered the State of Minnesota it was Democratic. When I entered the county in which I reside it was two to one Democratic. I asked no office; I expected none. But, Mr. Speaker, the charge comes from such a quarter that I cannot fail to notice it. Why, sir, the gentleman's family are chronic "office-beggars." They are nothing if not in office. Out of office they are miserable, wretched, God-forsaken—as uncomfortable as that famous stump-tailed bull in fly time. [Laughter.] Why, this whole trouble arises from the persistent determination of one of the gentleman's family to sit in this body. Why, Mr. Speaker, every young male of the gentleman's family is born into the world with "M. C." franked across his broadest part. [Laughter.] The great calamity seems to be that God, in His infinite wisdom, did not make any of them broad enough for the letters "U. S. S." [Laughter.] There was room for U. S. "We, Us & Co.," the firm.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must state to the gentleman from Minnesota that these remarks are beyond the range of proper parliamentary debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the party will be permitted to go on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair endeavors to restrain debate, if possible, within proper limits.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would be sorry to overstep the proper limits of debate; but the House must perceive from the character of that letter that I must necessarily speak under some heat.

Mr. Speaker, I turn now to the charges against my personal character. The vile insinuation contained in that letter that I was a fugitive from justice, that I "fled from the city of Philadelphia under suspicious circumstances between two days," is an absolute, unqualified, unmitigated falsehood; and but for the respect I have for you, sir, and for this House, I would use stronger language. I left the city of Philadelphia on the 15th of May, 1857, in broad daylight, from the depot of the Pennsylvania Central railroad, accompanied to that depot by crowds of friends. For months before my departure I had advertised in the papers of that city (for I had many pecuniary transactions with different people) that I would leave upon the 1st day of May, and that all persons having claims against me must present them.

Now, sir, a friend of mine, General Le Duc, of Minnesota, who the other day was in Philadelphia, hearing of these slanders, examined the old files of the Philadelphia Ledger, and cut from them the advertisement which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC LEDGER, May 12, 1857.

At a meeting of the Union Land and Homestead Association No. 1, held on Friday evening, the 8th instant, at Eighth and Locust streets, upon the presentation and acceptance of the resignation of Ignatius Donnelly, esq., from the office of secretary of the company, the following resolutions were offered by Dr. James Bryan, and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of this association are tendered to Mr. Ignatius Donnelly for his earnest, zealous, and untiring efforts in its behalf. We sincerely believe that most of its success has been due to his exertions. He has not only given to it his time and his energy, but when it most needed assistance he has also advanced his means largely in its behalf.

Resolved. That he bears with him to his new home the best wishes of the members of this association for his prosperity and success.

Resolved. That these resolutions be published in one or more of the daily papers.

JOHN DUROSS, Chairman.

T. WILLARD GEORGE, Secretary.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, that advertisement appeared in the most public paper in the city of Philadelphia, a paper with sixty thousand circulation. It appeared on the 12th of May, three days before my departure, so that it seems to me it is a sufficient answer to the charge that I fled from that city by stealth. That advertisement notices my intended removal and expresses the good wishes of that body for my prosperity in it, a prosperity which, I thank God, I have enjoyed despite the malicious and desperate opposition which has been made to me in some quarters.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on a subsequent occasion, when I was in the city of Philadelphia—for I want to leave nothing that the tongue of slander can touch upon unexplained—when I was in the city of Philadelphia, a man who belonged to one of these companies of which I had been secretary, after my absence from the city, during the crisis of 1857, either from poverty or other cause, was unable to pay up his installments upon the stock he held in it, and according to the rule of that society—the universal rule in all such bodies—he forfeited the stock he held. He had no remedy against the society; but hearing that I, who had formerly been its secretary and had settled up my affairs with it, was in Philadelphia and was a member of Congress, he thought, as such base natures think, that he might wring from my fears this money which he had no legal claim to, and he commenced proceedings against me. I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read a letter—a letter from a gentleman well known to many members of this House personally, well known, I think, to all of them by reputation, the distinguished Benjamin Harris Brewster, of Philadelphia—a man whose learning, genius, and character have illuminated the profession of the law in that State, of which he is now Attorney General—the man under whom I studied law, and who knew me from my boyhood up. I ask the Clerk to read what he says in answer to this slander.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL,
HARRISBURG, April 28, 1868.

MY DEAR MR. DONNELLY: Your letter of yesterday is now before me. It is a surprise to me that any one should be so hardy as to assail your good name for acts done while a resident here.

To me you have been known for nearly twenty years. You were my student, and from 1849 to 1853 you were daily with me; and down to 1857 there was not a week that we were not in constant intercourse. For a year before you left it was publicly notorious that you were arranging your affairs to go west and reside there. Your departure was open, public, conspicuously public. You made a formal call on me to bid me good-bye.

Your character from your boyhood up was well known to me; your business affairs were known to me, as you advised with me, and from other sources my means of information were exact, and you were regarded by me, as by others, indeed, by all who ever spoke to me of you, as a man of uncommon energy, skill, and strict integrity.

After you had been absent for some years, and on an occasion when you were present in Philadelphia, my recollection is that it was in 1863 you came to me, and, to my surprise, you advised me that some person of the name of Porter had charged you with a conspiracy to defraud. As your counsel, the whole matter was committed to my exclusive charge. The case was heard before the magistrate, in my presence, and he discharged you, there being no proof of any kind against you.

My recollection is distinct; there was not the shadow of proof against you. The conviction impressed on my mind then was, and still is, that it was an attempt, under color of criminal proceedings, to frighten you into the payment of a debt you did not owe; and that there was also some personal and political ill-feeling at the bottom of the affair.

In that transaction you acted like a man of courage and high honor. You refused to plead the statute of limitations, and you also refused to plead your privilege as a member of the House of Representatives; and that refusal was publicly announced by me in open court, before the magistrate and all the bystanders. You also, being present, announced, through me, that no technical defense of any kind would be set up; that you challenged any one to come forward and make a charge, if they had any to make; and, as representing you, I further said that, if notice were sent to me at any subsequent day, when you were absent, that you would forthwith be produced by me, at any time and from any distance; that you had been honored by a respectable constituency with a responsible office, and that you owed it to their honor and to your own honor to confront all accusers at all times and meet all such charges on their merits.

For my part, to me you have ever been dear as a friend and a pupil of whom I am proud.

You are known by me to enjoy a character for stern integrity, and by me you would be trusted to the utmost limit of human confidence.

Truly, as ever, more and more, your friend,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Hon. I. DONNELLY,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, how noble, how beautiful do such utterances appear beside the base, leprous slanders that have been sought to be heaped upon me! I stand here reiterating the declaration I then made, that if anywhere on God's earth, down in the mire of filth and all nastiness, the gentleman can pluck up anything that touches my honor, let it come. I shall meet it on its merits. I have gone through the entire catalogue; I have analyzed the contents of the gentleman's foul stomach; I have dipped my hand in its gall; I have examined the half-digested fragments that I found floating in the gastric juice; but if it is possible for the peristaltic action of the gentleman from Illinois to bring up anything more loathsome, more disgusting than he has vomited over me in that letter, in God's name, let it come.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must say to the gentleman from Minnesota that these remarks are out of order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, I hope the party will be permitted to go on by unanimous consent.

Mr. DONNELLY. I am glad the gentleman is willing that I shall have unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. Speaker, these charges are not original. One of the editors of the St. Paul Press, the paper in which the gentleman's letter appeared, a man named Driscoll, went to the city of Philadelphia and played the detective there. He stayed there for days hunting around to find something upon which slander could hang her crooked hands, and he came back with his hands empty. But that did not suffice. The gentleman's brother, four years ago, contesting with me the right to a seat in this House, repeated these slanders upon the streets of St. Paul until I was forced to come out in a card in the public papers of the State, and say that if they could prove anything against my honor I would withdraw from the contest for Congress and resign my seat in this body. I had thought, knowing the source from which these things spring, that that denial would have ended the matter. But it seems they are brought up here again. I shall not stop to amplify that splendid passage of Shakspeare which my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] was compelled the other day to quote against the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE:]

"Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;

'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which nothing enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

Why, Mr. Speaker, the cringing sneak-thief who picks your pocket or steals your overcoat is a Christian gentleman compared with that monster who would rob you of the precious mantle of your reputation and leave you shivering before the contempt of the world. The assassin who strikes you down in your blood leads at least your memory sacred among men, and your grave may be bedewed with the tears of affection; but he who would assassinate your reputation, who would strike at the life of your character, who would befoul you, who would cover you all over with night-soil, is a wretch whom "it were base flattery to call a coward." Beside such a man the memory of Booth grows respectable.

But the gentleman pauses not here. He tells us that I changed my politics. I am a very young man, Mr. Speaker. I became a Republican twelve years ago; I became a Republican in that year when the Republican party nominated their first candidate for the Presidency. I am almost coeval with the birth of the party. What a vile insinuation is this! It is an insult to every Democrat who has joined the Republican ranks; to those hundreds and thousands of good and true men without whose aid we could not have triumphed.

I turn to another point. The gentleman states—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the party will be permitted to go on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be permitted to proceed if there be no objection. No objection was made.

Mr. DONNELLY. I thank this House and the other "party" for this courtesy. [Laughter.]

It is scarcely worth while, Mr. Speaker, to notice all the petty charges which crawl over the surface of this letter as vermin crawl upon the body of a beggar. But in justice to myself, lest there might be some improper meaning attached to it, I will call attention to one other personal charge, that I have changed my name. The intention of the gentleman is to give out not only that I was a fugitive from justice, but that I traveled under an alias. Mr. Speaker, I was IGNATIUS DONNELLY within a very few hours after my birth; I am IGNATIUS DONNELLY now; and with God's help I expect to remain IGNATIUS DONNELLY to the end of my career. If I should ever be inclined to change my name it seems to me I would take that of Elihu. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I would change it.

Mr. DONNELLY. If I thought the gentleman would abandon it it would be an inducement for me to retain it.

What is the meaning of this attack, Mr. Speaker?—because there must be some meaning to it. There was nothing in my letter to Mr. Folsom to provoke such a terrible outpouring of bile. What is the meaning of it? Why, it means this. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has for a long time cracked his whip over the shoulders of the members of this House. He has been the natural successor here of those old slave-lords who used to crack their whips here.

But his vaulting ambition has at last overleaped itself. Not satisfied to assail us here, to vituperate us here, he is going to mold the next Congress; and he is going out into our districts to tell the people of the United States whom they shall select and whom they shall not select. Why, my friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE], as he tells me, meets in the newspapers of his district the assaults of the gentleman here.

He is ranging the whole vast amphitheater. Why does he do this? Why does he do it, Mr. Speaker? There is a very simple explanation which has come out in my district, and which is one of the great arguments why they should send to this House the brother of the distinguished gentleman. It is that he owns General Grant; that he carries Ulysses Grant in his breeches' pocket.

Why, sir, the gentleman already feels upon his shoulders the cares of empire. He is already forecasting Cabinets, dispensing foreign missions, setting men up and pulling men down. We can apply to him the language that Cleopatra used of Mark Antony:

"In his livery
Walk'd crowns and crownets; realms and islands
Were
As plates dropp'd from his pocket."

Why, Mr. Speaker, has he not lived in the same town with General Grant? And should he not, therefore, perforce, be the Warwick, the king-maker, the power behind the throne? I never could account, Mr. Speaker, for the singular fact that the gentleman did live in the same town with General Grant except by reference to that great doctrine of compensation which runs throughout the created world. The town of Galena having for so many years endured the gentleman, God Almighty felt that nothing less than Ulysses S. Grant could balance the account. [Laughter.] Josh Billings beautifully illustrates this doctrine of compensation when he says that it is a question whether the satisfaction of scratching will not pay a man for the pain of having the itch. [Laughter.] I leave the gentleman's constituents to apply the parable.

Mr. Speaker, I bow humbly before the genius of Ulysses S. Grant. I recognize him as the greatest, broadest, wisest intellect of this generation. I cannot believe that he will degenerate into a puppet to be pulled by wires held in the hands of the gentleman from Illinois; that he will degenerate into a kind of hand-organ to be toted around on the back of the gentleman from Illinois while his whole family sit on top of the machine grinning and catching pennies like a troop of monkeys. [Laughter.] I may mention here, as a friend suggests it to me, that I do not now allude to gentlemen of the same name who are fortunate enough not to be related to the gentleman by ties of consanguinity. [Laughter.] But if it were in my power to whisper anything in the way of advice into the ear of Ulysses S. Grant I would tell him to take counsel from that profound remark of Aminadab Slek when he said, "You all expect to get into heaven by hanging on to my coat tail; but I will fool you all. I will wear a monkey jacket."

Why, sir, we had General Grant up in Minnesota, and of course the distinguished gentleman from Illinois was with him, and when General Grant was serenaded the gentleman from Illinois stuck his head out of the window and thanked the crowd, [laughter;] and when they rode in an open barouche together, and the crowd hurraed, the gentleman from Illinois laid his hand upon his heart and bowed profound acknowledgments. [Renewed laughter.] Why, Mr. Speaker, my people up there were in great doubt which was Grant and which was WASHBURN. They naturally concluded that the quiet little gentleman must be the fourth-class politician, and that the pretentious, fussy individual must be the conqueror of Lee. Good old Jesse Grant, it is said, remarked on that occasion, "It 'pears to me that WASHBURN thinks he owns 'Lysses; but he don't own me, not by a long sight." [Laughter.]

Shall the two names go down in history together? Grant and WASHBURN! What a combination! Why, Mr. Speaker, the intellect of Grant is like some of those ancient warehouses in the great cities of the older Continent, where floor rises above floor and cellar descends below cellar, all packed full to overflowing with the richest merchandise. The intellect of the gentleman from Illinois is like some of those establishments we see on Pennsylvania avenue, where the entire stock in trade of the merchant is spread out in the front window and over it a label, "Anything in this window for one dollar." [Laughter.] Why, sir, he is the "Cheap John" of legislation. That he should sway General Grant is not consistent with the probabilities. Lord Dundreary was once asked why it was a dog wagged his tail. "Why," said his lordship, "the reason is because the dog is greater than the tail. If it were otherwise," said that profound thinker, "the tail would waggle the dog." [Laughter.] Here we have an instance, Mr. Speaker, where the smallest kind of a rat-terrier's tail attempts to waggle a Newfoundland dog. [Laughter.]

"Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition;
By that sin fell the angels; how can WASHBURN, then,
Hope to win by 't?"

The gentleman should take counsel from that proverb of the Romans, ex quovis ligno non fit Mercurius, which may be liberally translated, you cannot make a statesman out of every demagogue.

Mr. Speaker, I tremble for my country. Is it true that eighty odd years of republican Government have reduced us so low that there is but one honest man in this House, but one Lot in all this Sodom? Does no voice but his ring out against cliques and conspiracies and rings? Will no voice but his be heard in all the future assuring this House that they are all a pack of knaves, that the country is going to the devil, and concluding with that favorite quotation of his launched at us from the vast stores of his erudition:

"Shake not thy gory looks at me, Thou canst not say I did it," given with a roar like that of a wounded gorilla, and ending with a rush to the cloak-room amid the shouts and laughter of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, that I may not appear to exaggerate let me read to you one or two extracts from the gentleman's speeches. On the 26th of March of the present year, the question under discussion being the Union Pacific railroad, the gentleman spoke thus of this House:

"The lobby mustered in its full force. I say nothing here of the shameful means which it is alleged—"

He hedges in his slander with an if—

"which it is alleged were used in a 'confidential way'—"

In quotation marks—

"to carry through this bill; but I do say that the scene was one of the most exciting and animated that I have ever witnessed in a service of nearly sixteen years. The galleries were packed with people interested in the measure, by lobbyites, male and female, and by shysters and adventurers, hoping for some thing to 'turn up.' Your gilded corridors were filled with lobbyists who broke through all rules and made their way upon the floor and into the seats of members."

This, sir, was not an attack upon any one man. It was an attack upon the virtue, the decency, the honesty of this entire House—a cowardly attack—because if he knew that "shameful means" were used it was his duty to lay them bare.

Again, sir, in speaking on the 19th of March last of smugglers, violators of the law of the land, he told the country, by insinuation, that they were potent in this Chamber. Listen to him:

"This is a great interest in the country, an interest which controls, I may say, hundreds of millions of dollars, an interest which goes through courts and juries—I would not say it ever goes through Congress; no, sir—[laughter]"

He made his point, [laughter]—

"an interest, I would not say, that controls New York city."

Why, Mr. Speaker, if all this be true, I tremble for my country. What, if God, in a moment of enthusiasm at one of the gentleman's speeches, were to pluck him to his bosom and leave this wretched nation staggering on in darkness to ruin! I do not wonder that the gentleman's family manifest such an intense desire to get into Congress. I fancy the gentleman—for what would be our loss would be heaven's gain—I fancy the gentleman haranguing the assembled hosts of heaven, cherubims and the seraphims, the angels and the archangels! How he would sail into them! How he would rout them, horse, foot, and dragons! How he would attack their motives and fling insinuations at their honesty! And how he would declare for economy, and urge that the wheels of the universe must be stopped because they consumed too much grease! [Laughter.]

One word in conclusion. The gentleman has assailed me, and it is but right that I should put his own character in the balance. What great measure, in his sixteen years of legislation, has the gentleman ever originated? What liberal measure has ever met with his support? What original sentiment has he ever uttered? What thought of his has ever risen above the dead level of the dreariest platitudes? If he lay dead to-morrow in this Chamber, what heart in this body would experience one sincere pang of sorrow? Who is there in this House he has not assailed?

Why, he told the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Woodbridge] the other day, that every corrupt and profligate measure that was pressed in this body met with his support; and when the gentleman from Vermont rose upon him he cringed out of it like a whipped spaniel! Did he not say to my friend from Philadelphia [Mr. O'NEILL] the other day, that he would not say—for that is the gentleman's way of making an insinuation—that he would not say that the gentleman was one of a ring to swindle this country? Has he not attacked my friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE], and aspersed his motives in his legislation in this body? He has sought to build himself up upon our dishonor, to glorify himself in our disgrace, to pollute and befoul and traduce the very body of which he is a member. Why, sir, his harangues are the staple of the newspapers of the Opposition. We meet his charges on the stump. By his wholesale reckless assaults upon the honor and integrity of members he has lowered the standard of this body. He has furnished argument for the wit of Dan Rice. He has furnished substance for the slanderers of the pot-house.

Mr. Speaker, I need enter into no defense of the Fortieth Congress. In point of intellect, of devotion to the public welfare, of integrity of personal character, it will compare favorably with any Congress that ever sat since the foundation of our Government. It is illustrated by names that would do honor to any nation in any age of the world.

And if there be in our midst one low, sordid, vulgar soul; one barren, mediocre intelligence; one heart callous to every kindly sentiment and every generous impulse; one tongue leprous with slander; one mouth which is like unto a den of foul beasts giving forth deadly odors; if there be here one character which, while blotched and spotted all over, yet raves and rants and blackguards like a prostitute; if there be here one bold, bad, empty, bellowing demagogue, it is the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that these remarks are not honorable to the House of Representatives, of which he is a member.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the party will be allowed to go on.

The SPEAKER. Although the House may tolerate such remarks, the Chair cannot consent to permit them to go upon the record without his protest.

Mr. DONNELLY. I beg pardon of the House; I have no desire to trespass upon its rules, and no desire to offend its sense of propriety. But members of the House will bear me out when I say that no man who ever sat in this body has met with so violent, so extraordinary, so cruel an assault as that of which I have been the object. The newspapers of this country, from one end of it to the other, are copying the charges made by the gentleman; they are going everywhere upon the wings of the wind. And I think that the members of this House who know that I have never in five years' service here said a discourteous word to any gentleman upon this floor; that I have never before this time had occasion to rise here to a personal explanation; that neither upon the other side of this House nor upon this side can any gentleman rise and say that I have ever treated him with discourtesy, unkindness, or incivility; I say the House, in view of these facts, will pardon the natural heat which I exhibit.

I give way now to the gentleman from Illinois, if he desires to follow me. All I desire to say is, that I am prepared to meet and answer any and every charge that he can make against me. I thank the House for its very patient attention.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a personal explanation. Is there any objection?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not ask leave to speak in the way of a personal explanation. During all the time of my service here I have never asked leave to make a personal explanation, and I never expect to do so. During the entire time I have been here, I repeat, I have never asked to be allowed to make a personal explanation.

The party from Minnesota has had the letter which I wrote to a gentleman in that State read to this House. It goes upon the records of the House, and upon the record of the country, and there it will remain for all time. Mr. Speaker, every assertion made in that letter is true. Whoever says that there is a statement in it that is not true states that which is false.

Sir, if I were to be called upon—and I desire to say only this—if, under any press of circumstances, I were ever to be called upon to make a personal explanation here, and in reply to a member, it would not be a member who had committed a crime; it would not be a member who had run away; it would not be a member who had changed his name; it would not be a member whose whole record in this House was covered with venality, with corruption, and with crime.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that those remarks are not parliamentary.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the words just spoken be taken down in writing.

The SPEAKER. They will be taken down in writing and read by the Clerk.

Before the words were written out from the reporter's notes,

Mr. WINDOM said: If I may be allowed to do so, upon the advice of friends, I will withdraw my call to have the words taken down in writing, and after the gentleman from Illinois shall have concluded I will ask consent to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain any resolution even by unanimous consent, because it has been ordered that if the House shall return to this Hall from the Senate Chamber on any day after three o'clock no business shall be transacted unless previous notice shall have been given of the same.

Mr. WINDOM. I will ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask unanimous consent of the House for that purpose to-day. The House returned to the Hall to-day after three o'clock. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] stated to the Chair that he desired to make a personal explanation. The Chair replied to him that, as it was early in the afternoon, he would propound the question to the House, and if the House saw fit to allow any debate without any legislative action they could give their consent. The Chair did propound the question to the House, and the unanimous consent was given. The gentleman from Illinois will now proceed, in order, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has withdrawn his demand to have the words taken down.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know what the point of order was. I said I would not reply to a member—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the gentleman from Illinois now, or after he has concluded his remarks, as the gentleman pleases.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Of course I will yield to the Chair now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the reason he ruled the words out of order was, that, by the attitude and gestures of the gentleman, they appeared to be directed specially to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY], who had preceded him. Several times during the course of the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota the Chair notified him and the House that the remarks uttered were not parliamentary, and not in accordance with the decorum which this body should exhibit before the people we represent and before the world at large; and although the House did not see fit to follow up the statement of the Speaker by such action as may properly be taken when the Chair announces language to be unparliamentary, yet as these remarks of the gentleman from Illinois were equally in violation of the rule the Chair felt it his duty to declare them out of order.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to pursue this matter further at present; but I give notice that at the earliest possible time after the House has resumed business I will offer a resolution censuring the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I should certainly be very unwilling to be considered out of order, and I am sorry that the Chair should have supposed that I had violated any rule of this House. I was merely stating what I should do in a certain case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that, if his remarks were not intended to apply to the gentleman from Minnesota, toward whom he was looking, and to whom, apparently, he was addressing himself, the Chair will withdraw his ruling.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, sir, I will not look toward the member from Minnesota. But I will say (and this is all I desire to say) that if ever I should be called upon to make a personal explanation it will not be in reply to a member who is covered all over with crime and infamy, a man whose record is stained with every fraud—whisky, and other frauds—a man who has proved false alike to his friends, his constituents, his country, his religion, and his God.

On motion of Mr. EGGLESTON, the House (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of Dr. E. W. Savage, late a contract surgeon, United States Army, for a pension.

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of Edward W. Savage, a soldier of the late war, asking for a pension.

IN SENATE.

Monday, May 4, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM HAGUE, D. D., of Boston, Massachusetts.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m., when,

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 4, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The reading of the Journal of Saturday last was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota states that he rises to a question of privilege and desires to offer the resolution of which he gave notice on Saturday. As some time will probably be consumed in that matter, it will have to be postponed until after the return of the House from the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask leave to offer a resolution.

Mr. MILLER. Will business be transacted this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. As business will be transacted on the return of the House from the Senate, gentlemen will withhold their resolutions and so forth until that time.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. WINDOM obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to submit a resolution calling for information.

Mr. WINDOM. I will yield for that purpose.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House what judgments of the Court of Claims have been paid by the Treasury Department, the amount of each judgment paid, in whose favor, at what time paid, and to whom paid, either principal or attorney.

ARKANSAS ELECTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the General of the Army, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 2d instant, Brevet Major General H. E. Gillem's report of the recent election in Arkansas under the convention law; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and the letter ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF GEORGIA.

Mr. WINDOM. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN.]

Mr. BEAMAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to admit the State of Georgia to representation in Congress.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the introduction of any such bill. The State of Georgia is in the Union now.

Mr. BEAMAN. At the proper time I shall move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce it.

Mr. WINDOM. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] provided what he proposes does not give rise to discussion.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the House to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from New York, from the Brooklyn district, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and myself to record our votes on the resolution impeaching the President of the United States. We were both absent at the time the vote was taken, and paired. Since his return I have talked with him, and he desires his own vote recorded, and so do I mine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Missouri that the Journal of that period, and also the Congressional Globe of that period, are both printed. The entire editions of the Globe and of the Journal are printed. The gentleman can attain his object as well by stating how he would have voted if he had been here.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I presume it can be appended in a note to the Journal. The gentleman from New York would have voted against impeachment and I would have voted for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have this statement placed on the Journal.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object. I once asked in behalf of forty-seven members of this House the privilege of recording a protest and it was denied us. Besides, the gentleman ought to have changed his mind before now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move, then, to suspend the rules.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot yield the floor for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. WILLIAM J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill of the House No. 601, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agreed to the committee of conference asked by the House; and has appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. CONKLING of New York, and Mr. GRIMES of Iowa, to act as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. WINDOM. I gave notice on Saturday evening that I would, at the earliest possible moment, introduce a resolution of censure upon the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] growing out of, or based upon, the letter which he had written concerning my colleague, [Mr. DONNELLY.] However, at the request of my colleague, and after full consideration of the matter myself, I have modified the resolution which I proposed to offer. It is still a resolution of privilege, in my opinion. I offer the modified resolution, because I think the resolution of censure I at first intended to offer does not reach the case. The resolution I hold in my hand is one calling for a committee of investigation. I offer it for this reason, that one or two gentlemen on this floor should be expelled from this House. If my colleague is guilty of the crimes charged—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to debate before there is any subject before the House to be debated.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I offer the following preamble and resolution as being privileged:

Whereas ELIUB B. WASHBURN, a member of this House from the State of Illinois, did, on the 19th day of April, 1868, in the columns of a newspaper published in the city of St. Paul, Minnesota, styled the St. Paul Press, make a violent attack upon the character of IGNATIUS DONNELLY, a member of this House from the State of Minnesota, in which he charged him, among other things, with bribery and corruption, and with being a fugitive from justice, in the following words:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1868.

DEAR SIR: Some one has sent me a Minnesota newspaper containing a letter addressed to you by Mr. "I. DONNELLY." This Mr. "I. DONNELLY" seems to be in search of sympathy from his constituents, by making a whining complaint against me for objecting to the introducing of some bill which he pretended to be anxious to get before the House. He must place a very low estimate upon the intelligence of his constituents if he does not suppose they could see through his shallow device to make a little local capital under a pretense thoroughly false.

He says he had prepared a bill for a grant of land to construct a railroad "from Taylor's Falls, via St. Cloud, to the western boundary of the State," and that he attempted to introduce it into the House, and that I objected to it, and which objection he says "delayed for the present all action on the bill."

As he has addressed you on the subject, I will ask you to look, for a moment, at this jesuitical performance of your member in this regard. He knew, in the first place, that there was not the ghost of a chance for the passage of any such bill; and, in the second place, if such a bill should pass, there would be little, if any, land between Taylor's Falls and St. Cloud to go to the State under the proposed grant, as nearly all the land is either taken up or included in former grants. And what would seem strange in the light of this extraordinary letter in regard to this very important matter, is that your member should have delayed the introduction of this bill for the long period of four months, for he could have introduced it, under the rules, on every Monday since Congress met, which was on the 21st day of November last. But he failed to bring it in until the 20th day of last month, when he attempted to get it in out of order.

This was on Friday. On the succeeding Monday, the 23d ultimo, Minnesota was called for the introduction of bills, under which call this very bill could have been introduced by your member, regardless of any and all objections by myself or by any one else. But what will a constituency think of a Representative who, after parading before them the grievance that I objected to his introduction of his bill on Friday, the 20th of March, failed to introduce the same bill on Monday, the 23d of March, when there could have been no objection to it? As to the "delay" he speaks of, which will throw "the bill forward to a very late period in the session," it will be perceived that he alone is responsible for it.

The exploits of your member in this matter are akin to another jesuitical performance of his in the same line. On the 27th of January last he introduced a bill into the House granting, as I understand, (I have not seen the bill,) two hundred thousand acres of land to improve the Mississippi river between St. Paul and Minneapolis. The object of this action, undoubtedly, was to antagonize this proposition to grant land for this purpose (a proposition almost unprecedented and which he knew Congress would never agree to) with a proposition before the Committee on Commerce to make an appropriation of money for that purpose. By these means he supposed he might defeat aid for the object, and then have another opportunity to attribute the failure to me, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

How contemptible must any Representative of an intelligent and patriotic constituency appear, when found guilty of such a scandalous attempt to impose upon them!

Mr. DONNELLY says he is at a loss to account for my action in objecting to his bill, and he evidently intends to convey the idea that my official action is hostile to the interests of your State. I objected to the bill not only because he attempted to introduce it out of order, but I objected to it for the reason that from my knowledge of his character, and from his connection with legislation here, I have become extremely suspicious of everything that he proposes. And when your member arraigns me for hostility to the interests of your noble State, he seems to forget what is known to all your older settlers, that I labored here for the interests of your State, by both voice and vote, long before he left Philadelphia, under suspicious circumstances, between two days, and long before he changed his name and politics; the latter from a Buchanan Locofoco to a Republican; and made his advent in Minnesota as an office beggar. It is not my opposition to Minnesota interests that excites the hostility of your member. It is my opposition to his schemes of plunder and aggrandizement that leads him to assail me. My congressional record for sixteen years is open to the public, and I challenge its severest scrutiny. I trust it will not be found to be stained with venality, corruption, and crime. I commend the examination of the record of your member to his constituents, and if they do not find that every corrupt, extravagant, and profligate measure ever brought before the House has received his support I will acknowledge myself mistaken.

It might be well for the constituents of your member to inquire what was his action in the matter of legalizing by act of Congress that most serious obstruction to the free navigation of the Mississippi river, the Clinton bridge? This bridge has been the means of inflicting untold injury upon the commerce and people of the upper Mississippi. It has been the terror of all lumbermen of Minnesota, and they have been damaged in various ways by the obstruction of the Clinton and Rock Island bridges hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars. Indeed, it is safe to say that the damage done by the breaking up of rafts, the increased expense of running them, on account of the danger of passing these bridges, the increased price of freight and insurance on account of the bridges, costs the people of Minnesota $500,000 a year. When the bill came up in the House to legalize the Clinton bridge and make it a post road, and was pressed to its passage by the unscrupulous agents of the corrupt railroad monopolies, whose object was to so impede the free navigation of the Mississippi as to compel your farmers to ship their products east over railroads at a vastly enhanced rate of freight, I resisted the passage of the bill in the interest of your people and the people of the upper Mississippi with all my might. The day before the bill passed Mr. DONNELLY voluntarily came to my seat and assured me of his hearty support, and urged me to keep up a vigorous opposition. You can well conceive my surprise and indignation the next day on finding him voting for the bill. I could only account for his sudden conversion on the hypothesis that he had been "seen" during the previous night.

You know something of the Union Pacific railroad, which is likely to become one of the most monstrous monopolies the world has ever known. Though built by a subsidy from the Government, the oppressions and extortions of the company practiced upon the people have excited universal indignation. Mr. WINDOM, of your State, introduced two or three months since a joint resolution creating a board to limit the rate of passage and freight over this road. Passengers are now charged ten cents per mile fare, and freight is charged at the rate of fifteen cents per mile per ton. Mr. I. DONNELLY voted to lay this joint resolution upon the table. With a free annual pass over the road in his own pocket, he was willing to see every constituent of his who traveled over the road charged ten cents a mile fare.

I beg leave to commend your attention to another matter deeply affecting your member and the interests of your State. His predecessor, the ever faithful representative of Minnesota interests, Colonel Aldrich, by persistent effort, in conjunction with his colleague, Mr. WINDOM, secured an amendment to the Union Pacific railroad bill, which compelled the building of a road west from Sioux City to join the Union Pacific, which would have brought the head of Lake Superior one hundred miles nearer to the point of junction than Chicago. Yet it was stated in the House the other day by Mr. ALLISON, of Iowa, and it has not since been denied, that this Minnesota member secured a change in the law, by which the Union Pacific railroad was released from its obligation to build this branch, and a transfer to another company made, which other company built a road down the valley of the Missouri river, and has received over one million dollars in violation of law. Holding the important position he has occupied on the Pacific Railroad Committee, the constituents of the member will probably desire to be informed touching the consideration which induced this wanton betrayal of their interests.

But I have neither time nor inclination to pursue this matter further. Perhaps I should not now have taken this trouble had this been the first time your member, without any provocation whatever, had seen fit to send attacks upon me to his constituents. Instead of making his complaints here, with a degree of cowardice only equaled by his mendacity, he parades himself, like a whipped school-boy, before his constituents, and whines at me because I exercised a parliamentary right in objecting to the introduction of one of his bills into the House out of order. I need add nothing further.

Yours respectfully, E. B. WASHBURN.

Hon. W. H. C. FOLSOM, Taylor's Falls, Minnesota.

P. S.—Papers in Minnesota that have published Mr. DONNELLY's letter are requested to publish this.

And whereas the said ELIUB B. WASHBURN did, on the 2d day of May, 1868, in his place on the floor of the House of Representatives, repeat said charges against the said IGNATIUS DONNELLY, in the following words:

"The party from Minnesota has had the letter which I wrote to a gentleman in that State read to this House. It goes upon the records of the House and upon the record of the country, and there it will remain for all time. Mr. Speaker, every assertion made in that letter is true. Whoever says that there is a statement in it that is not true states that which is false.

"Sir, if I were to be called upon—and I desire to say only this—if, under any press of circumstances, I were ever to be called upon to make a personal explanation here, and in reply to a member, it would not be a member who had committed a crime; it would not be a member who had run away; it would not be a member who had changed his name; it would not be a member whose whole record in this House was covered with venality, with corruption, and with crime."

"Well, sir, I will not look toward the member from Minnesota. But I will say (and this is all I desire to say) that if ever I should be called upon to make a personal explanation it will not be in reply to a member who is covered all over with crime and infamy, a man whose record is stained with every fraud—whisky, and other frauds—a man who has proved false alike to his friends, his constituents, his country, his religion, and his God." Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth or falsehood of the charges so made, with power to send for persons and papers, and with leave to report to this House at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that this is a question of privilege, upon the ground, (as found upon page 155 of the Digest, and within the knowledge of all the old members of the House,) that "charges affecting the character of a member of Congress," when made distinctly, even by a person not a fellow-member, are regarded as questions of privilege. General charges and denunciations, vague and not specific in their character, are not usually regarded as questions of privilege. But when charges have been made in newspapers by persons not holding the relation to a member of Congress that a fellow-member does, imputing distinctly that affecting the honor and reputation of a member, they are regarded as questions of privilege. This, however, is subject to the rules of the House; and if objection is made to the consideration of this resolution at this time the Chair will submit to the House the question, Shall the resolution be considered at this time for its decision?

No objection was made.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] proceeds with his remarks, the Chair desires the Clerk to read a portion of the sixty-first rule, to be found upon page 173. It is within the recollection of members of this House that the Chair repeatedly ruled the other day that remarks uttered of a personal character were unparliamentary. The Clerk will now read that portion of the rule which states what next occurs, when that ruling has been made by the Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

"If the decision be in favor of the member called to order he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be at liberty to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House, and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had this rule read for the information of the House to show, what is familiar to many members, that when the Speaker declares words uttered in debate by a member to be unparliamentary and disorderly, if no other member objects to the member going on, the responsibility for debate proceeding in that line is upon the House. The rules do not clothe the Speaker with arbitrary power. They clothe him with power to stop a member in the midst of a speech, if he regards the remarks as personal and disorderly; and then, if any member objects, the member who has transgressed the rules cannot proceed except by the leave of the House. The Chair speaks of this now because he does not know what personal remarks gentlemen may propose to make to-day.

Mr. SPALDING. Will it be in order, with the permission of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] to offer a substitute for the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will be, if the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] who holds the floor, yields for that purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not yield at present.

Several MEMBERS. Let the amendment be read for information.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to allowing the amendment to be read for information.

Mr. SPALDING. I will say before the Clerk reads the amendment that I present it with the best feelings toward both the gentlemen concerned and toward the House. When a proper opportunity arises I will speak upon the proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the debates in this House of Saturday, the 2d instant, arising upon the personal explanation of the member from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] and joined in by the member from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] are filled with personal invective of so gross a nature as to be highly prejudicial to the character of this body for dignity and decorum; and whereas the House was itself in fault in not checking such disorderly debate in its progress, especially as the honorable Speaker did repeatedly intervene in that behalf; Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the pleasure of this House that no part of said proceedings be published in the Congressional Globe.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot yield for that proposition. It would be utterly impossible to carry it out, as the Globe is already printed.

Mr. SPALDING. This refers to the Congressional Globe, not the Daily Globe.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to interfere in this matter, and I shall make no speech on the subject. My reason for changing my resolution from one of censure upon the gentleman from Illinois to one of investigation of the charges made by that gentleman against the character of my colleague is that I believe one or the other of these gentlemen (I shall not now attempt to decide which) is not entitled to a seat on this floor. Certainly if my colleague is as guilty, or one hundredth part as guilty, as is charged here he should be expelled as early as possible. On the other hand, if the gentleman from Illinois fails to make proof of the charges he has made—and I believe that my colleague on Saturday proved to the satisfaction of every man in this House, excepting, it may be, the gentleman from Illinois, that those charges are not true—if he fails to make proof of those charges, I say that he should be expelled from this House for slander. I am in favor of going to the root of this matter. I have no feeling upon this subject; but I desire that this House, when such charges as these are made, shall thoroughly investigate them.

In conclusion, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I would not, under any consideration, accept the position of chairman of this committee, if it shall be appointed, because being from the same State it might be charged that I had some prejudice in favor of my colleague. I therefore desire that some other member shall be placed in that position.

I now yield to my colleague for a single moment.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I have requested my colleague to present this resolution demanding an investigation into the truth or falsehood of the charges made by the gentleman from Illinois. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I can conclusively demonstrate that there is no shadow of truth in any of those charges; and I want it to go to the country that if I am apparently placed here in the position of a defendant it is at my own request, and that I challenge investigation into my whole life and character.

One word further. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, the force and justice of the resolution offered by my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] I am aware, sir, that in that debate I transcended the rules of parliamentary discussion; and in so far as I offended against the sense of propriety of the Speaker or of the House I would make this my humble apology to the Speaker and to the House. And I would ask this House to remember the provocation under which I spoke—not the ordinary provocation to which men are sometimes subjected here, but provocation reaching right down to the life of my character—provocation based upon a wholesale charge of crimes. I would, however, ask the House to remember that even in the heat of passion, and in the vehemence of debate, I made no assault of that nature on the gentleman from Illinois. If the House will turn to the record of that debate they will find that what I said touched only his public character and his characteristics as exhibited here upon this floor. I made no assault upon his honesty, upon his integrity, upon his private character. I ask this fact to be remembered when the House forms its judgment upon my remarks.

I conclude, therefore, as I began, by saying that I demand investigation, I challenge investigation, and I shall ask, if these terrible and sweeping charges are not sustained before that committee by the gentleman from Illinois, that the full measure of the law shall be applied to him by this body.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to add further, that, with the consent of the Speaker, I do not desire to be placed on the committee at all, either as chairman or otherwise, if one shall be raised. I call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. WINDOM. I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not in the House on Saturday evening, for I think I should have interrupted some of this debate, which has so bad an aspect that it ought not to be permitted to go upon the lasting records of this House. But, sir, I was not here. Members who were here saw fit not to interfere, although I read in the report that the Speaker discharged his duty amply. I can only say that I regret the occurrence, for I have for both the gentlemen interested the highest respect, and if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] had come into the House as he has come to-day, submitted his letters with his explanations, leaving out the vilification and abuse, and called for a committee, I should have had no hesitation in according it to him, because I thought that letter a very hard one—a very hard one. But if the gentleman sought for vengeance he has had it already fourfold; for, sir, as much as I have heard about Billingsgate and fish-market abuse, never could I find in either anything to compare with the language used on this floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I call the gentleman to order, and ask that his words be taken down. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. Being stopped by a call to order, I yield the floor.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would ask my colleague to withdraw the point of order, and then I will ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WINDOM. There can be very little doubt that the gentleman's words were out of order, but I withdraw the point and the demand that they be taken down.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I renew the demand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the demand comes too late, and for the reason that the gentleman from Ohio stated that he had concluded his remarks while the other point was pending. It was then withdrawn by the gentleman from Minnesota, who alone had the right, having the point in his possession, it having been made by himself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I simply wanted to know what the rule of order is, for I stood ready to renew the demand at any time.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's colleague now has the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has misinterpreted my motives. I have no desire for vengeance. I have asked for this committee of investigation because, after I produced what I believe to be the ample proofs of the falsity of the charges made against me, the gentleman from Illinois rose and reiterated them here.

I am willing to concede that he may possibly have spoken under the influence of intense excitement and heat. I can scarcely think he meant what he said in those concluding remarks. I have no desire for vengeance upon him, but my character is at stake, my reputation is involved. If the gentleman can stand up here and say in the face of this country that he retracts those charges, I ask that this matter go no further. But the House can readily perceive that when I am charged here with crimes I must follow it up. That is precisely my position.

Mr. WINDOM. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I was present on Saturday and listened to the remarks that were made by the gentleman from Minnesota and the reply by the gentleman from Illinois. I take my full share of the odium which those remarks justly cast upon this body. It was my duty, which I failed to perform, to have striven, as well as I might, to interrupt and put a stop to them. I have nothing to say in my own justification for having sat here and listened to remarks of the character of which no man can find a parallel in the debates of the Congress of the United States from their beginning. Certainly in the time that I have been a member of this House I have never heard anything that compared with those remarks, both in their personal character and in the degrading and offensive language used on that occasion.

Mr. WINDOM. I call the gentleman to order, and ask that the words he has just uttered shall be taken down.

The SPEAKER. They will be taken down and read by the Clerk.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to know upon what meat my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has fed—

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman is not in order. I called him to order, and I make a second point of order that his remarks do not relate to the resolution now under consideration.

The Clerk read the words objected to, as follows:

"Certainly in the time that I have been a member of this House I have never heard anything that compared with those remarks, both in their personal character and in the degrading and offensive language used on that occasion."

The SPEAKER. Those words, as the House will see, admit of two constructions. The first is that the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] were degrading to himself; and secondly, that they were degrading to the gentleman at whom they were aimed, to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] The Chair thinks unquestionably that the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota, if accepted by the House, does degrade the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair, therefore, thinks that, if those words should have that construction, the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] are not out of order.

The Chair, however, does not think the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts out of order. He is compelled to so decide upon his own sense of the language that was uttered upon Saturday. The Chair then said, as will be seen by reference to the Daily Globe:

"The Chair will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that these remarks are not honorable to the House of Representatives, of which he is a member."

If they are dishonorable to the House of Representatives, of which all of us are members, the gentleman from Minnesota, the gentleman from Illinois, the Speaker, and the rest of the members, then they are certainly degrading. The Chair said on Saturday that they were dishonorable to the House of Representatives; his statement was not then questioned; he is of that impression still.

If the gentleman has a right to defend himself when assailed in that tender point, his character, he should remember that he owes a duty to the House of Representatives, of which he is a member, and that if he does anything dishonorable or offensive the whole House is injured almost as much as himself.

The Chair, therefore, rules that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] are not out of order, for they certainly are correct, in the first construction, that the language of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] if correct, was degrading to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, it was furthest from any intention of mine to have transgressed any rules of debate in the remarks I was making deprecating what I believed to be a gross violation of the rules of debate on Saturday last.

I am not upon the floor at this time to defend either the gentleman from Minnesota or the gentleman from Illinois. It was not my purpose in rising to say one word in defense of either of them. The gentleman from Minnesota had a right to his defense against the severe letter which he had read at the Clerk's desk. I do not complain that he chose to defend himself upon this floor. But I have a word to say in reference to the phraseology of the resolution offered by his colleague, [Mr. WINDOM,] and to the remarks of the gentleman himself [Mr. DONNELLY] upon the floor this afternoon. The preamble of the resolution recites, as worthy of denunciation by this House, remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois in his place on Saturday last in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota. I now beg the attention of members of this House one moment, to see whether they are in a condition to pass any vote that by implication will censure the gentleman from Illinois for the remarks he made on Saturday.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Not quite yet; I am afraid, if I do, I shall be out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is entitled to the floor whenever he chooses to resume it.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman can take me from the floor when he pleases.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish the gentleman to answer a question.

Mr. DAWES. I will do so when I have concluded my remarks. I know I hold the floor subject to the gentleman from Minnesota, and he can resume it whenever he pleases.

The gentleman from Minnesota who made the remarks on Saturday [Mr. DONNELLY] has arisen in his place to-day and apologized to the Speaker and to the House for his unparliamentary remarks. Now, Mr. Speaker, although the gentleman from Minnesota puts his apology upon the ground that in the heat of the provocation he, as many of us might be, was led to say many things which, upon cool and calm consideration of the subject, he would not have said; yet if you look over the Globe you will see that he has corrected his remarks in a cooler and calmer time than when upon the floor and under the provocation of the unjust letter, as he, no doubt, deemed it, which he had read at the Clerk's desk. He has corrected both the Associated Press report and the Globe report; and he has corrected the Associated Press report in some particulars and the Globe report in others. Hence I assume that the gentleman, having looked his remarks all over in his calm moments, has concluded to let them go to the country as we find them in the Globe. And his colleague objects to the resolution of my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] on the ground that it is now too late, because the debate has gone into the Globe, to relieve ourselves from the imputation of putting into our permanent records this debate of Saturday. Now, Mr. Speaker, before this resolution is acted on, let me ask the attention of this House to what the gentleman from Minnesota has chosen to leave in the Globe report, and afterward I propose to inquire whether his colleague, or any other member of this House who sat here and permitted him to utter even what is left in the Globe without calling him to order, did not by silence and acquiescence accord to the gentleman from Illinois the opportunity to reply in as severe language as he could command?

Mr. WINDOM. Will the gentleman give way a moment?

Mr. DAWES. When I get through.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say that the gentleman misapprehends entirely my resolution, and all his argument is based upon that misapprehension. He says that a portion of the resolution casts an imputation upon the gentleman from Illinois. I do not so understand it. It simply recites the letter of the gentleman from Illinois and the remarks which he made here, and proposes the appointment of a committee to investigate the truth of those charges. The House, by the adoption of that resolution, will not decide anything with reference to the truth or falsity of the charges. The resolution conveys no imputation whatever upon the gentleman from Illinois. I desire that there should be no such imputation. The resolution contains nothing to which the gentleman's remarks can apply when he speaks of its casting an imputation. Hence what he proposes to submit is not in order upon this resolution. He misunderstands my resolution, or else I do. For this reason I wanted to stop the gentleman a few moments ago.

Mr. DAWES. Let us see what the resolution says:

And whereas the said ELIHU B. WASHBURN did, on the 2d day of May, 1868, in his place on the floor of the House of Representatives, repeat said charges against said IGNATIUS DONNELLY in the following words—

I omit a part of the language quoted and pass on to read that which strikes me as justifying what I have said:

"Sir, if I were to be called upon—and I desire to say only this—if, under any press of circumstances, I were ever to be called upon to make a personal explanation here, and in reply to a member, it would not be a member who had committed a crime; it would not be a member who had run away; it would not be a member who had changed his name; it would not be a member whose whole record in this House was covered with venality, with corruption, and with crime."

I do not know for what reason this is inserted in the preamble if the sole object of the resolution is to have a committee appointed to investigate the charges of crime contained in the letter. What I wished to say was this: the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has apologized to the House and to the Speaker for the language which he used, and put his apology upon the ground of the heat of debate and the provocation of the letter which was read. Now, I ask the House, before it votes upon this question, to listen—

Mr. WINDOM. I have yielded to the gentleman for a considerable length of time, but I desire now to say that I object to his proceeding in this line of remark for two or three reasons.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has the right to resume the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman is very sensitive, as we all are, about spreading such remarks as these upon the record, yet he desires now to read the remarks, thus incorporating them a second time into the Globe and necessitating a second expunging resolution, if the gentleman's idea is correct.

But the gentleman says that there is an imputation against the gentleman from Illinois contained in this last clause which he has read from the gentleman's speech as quoted in the resolution. So far as that is concerned, if the gentleman's own letter and his own speeches, simply quoted without comment, convey an imputation upon him, then the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. Otherwise he is entirely at fault in his construction of that resolution; for there is in the resolution nothing which in any way commits this House to the truth or falsity of the charges. Now, sir, I think that upon this resolution a discussion of my colleague's speech is not at all in order and should not be allowed here. I object to it because it has no connection whatever with the subject, and I wish to bring this matter to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman take me from the floor?

Mr. WINDOM. I object to your reading the speech.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman says that if the speech of the gentleman from Illinois is an imputation upon the gentleman from Illinois, well and good, for it is nothing but the speech which he has quoted in his resolution. I was remarking upon the very fact that he should arraign the gentleman's speech of Saturday. He attempted first, if you will recollect, to prevent the gentleman from Illinois from replying at all on Saturday, and then upon reflection withdrew his point of order. He has embodied in his resolution that speech which the gentleman from Illinois made, and I was about to say that the House permitted the gentleman from Minnesota, with or without what was in its judgment sufficient provocation, to utter upon this floor what they could not have permitted him to utter without according to the gentleman from Illinois permission to reply in just as severe language as he could employ. And I desire to satisfy the House that it must be so by reading the provocation given to the gentleman from Illinois, and which you yourselves allowed to be given.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask the gentleman a question that we may understand one another, and to preface it by a remark.

The question at issue in this resolution is a question of fact—are these charges made against my colleague true or not? Now, does the gentleman propose to read here a portion of the speech of my colleague bearing upon that question? Nothing that my colleague said upon Saturday would justify the gentleman from Illinois in telling an untruth and publishing it. The gentleman's argument can have no other bearing than that. The gentleman from Illinois may have been justified in making severe remarks. If he wants to get up and do as my colleague has done, make an apology to the House for such remarks, he has my permission and yours to do so. But it certainly cannot bear upon this resolution, no matter what my colleague may have said. The question is, are these charges—which are charges of crime against my colleague—true or false? That is all there is in the resolution. I say that the speech of my colleague can have no bearing on that question, and hence I object to its being read.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman takes me from the floor, of course, I must stop.

Mr. WINDOM. I do so far as that is concerned.

Mr. DAWES. Well, now, I appeal to the gentleman from Minnesota if he proposes—

Mr. WINDOM. I have yielded several times to the gentleman from Massachusetts; I yield now to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.]

Mr. DAWES. Did the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me upon condition that I should subordinate myself to his views of my duty upon this floor?

Mr. WINDOM. I yielded to the gentleman as long as I thought he was entitled to it, and I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the House will not second the previous question on this resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. If the gentleman is here acting as the friend of the gentleman from Illinois, I hope that because of my refusal to let him occupy my time the House will not refuse to investigate the charges which his friend has made.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Minnesota is willing to yield the floor to me long enough, I will say that I am here as no man's friend; I am not here to oppose any investigation, but I am not here to see in silence the gentleman from Minnesota to-day, as he did on Saturday, play prochein amy to his colleague and justify his colleague in any unparliamentary and vituperative language that he pleases to use and then shut off every one else from reply.

Mr. WINDOM. I will ask the gentleman on what grounds he makes any such charge?

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the gentleman. He sat here on Saturday and never opened his mouth while the speech of his colleague was made which he says here now has no justification whatever, and the moment the gentleman from Illinois opened his mouth in reply he called him to order, and was only persuaded to withdraw it by the intervention of his own friends. And to-day, the moment any comment is made upon the provocation for the severe language of the gentleman from Illinois, which language he has incorporated in his resolution, he asserts his prerogative to take the floor from the member who thus comments.

Mr. WINDOM. I acted as the prochein amy of my colleague no more than the gentleman from Massachusetts, who sat here and heard the language used.

Mr. DAWES. I did not undertake to stop either gentleman.

Mr. WINDOM. It was not my business more than his to call my colleague to order.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman came to his sense of propriety very completely afterward. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. Well, then, I went further than he did. I called one gentleman to order; he did not call either of them to order. Therefore, in that respect, I stand better before the House than he does.

So far as the language of my colleague is concerned, the gentleman from Massachusetts says that I have condemned that language here to-day. Sir, if my colleague is guilty of what the gentleman from Illinois charges upon him, then I also shall condemn him. I condemn the language of my colleague, in so far as it may be considered in violation of good taste; on that ground it may be considered objectionable to the House. But I do not to-day condemn my colleague for using the severe language which he used against the gentleman from Illinois on Saturday; and I shall not condemn him until the gentleman from Illinois proves him guilty. Then I shall commend everything the gentleman from Illinois has written about him. But if the gentleman from Illinois shall fail, under this resolution, to prove the charges he has made against my colleague, then I shall expect every member of this House to use as strong language against him as my colleague has done. That is as far as my condemnation of my colleague goes.

I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] for a few minutes.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I am quite happy that the little altercation between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has passed away so pleasantly. For at one time it had assumed so serious an aspect that there was every prospect of another resolution of censure or of expulsion to be acted upon by the House.

Now, sir, I am not going to discuss the resolution of my friend from Minnesota. When the vote comes to be taken upon it I shall vote according to the dictates of my own judgment. I am rather pleased that this matter has come before the House, because with my education and my instincts I have thought, ever since I have been here, that it would be far more commendable in members of this House, and far more creditable to their constituencies and to the country, if they would conduct themselves in debate, and upon all occasions, with that spirit and that courtesy that become gentlemen. The efforts and the action of this House would have greater effect upon the country and we would be far more respected than we are to-day if we would observe in our debates and our discussions that courtesy and that politeness which ought to be in the nature of every man who has a seat here.

I rise merely to say a word or two, because my name was mentioned in the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] the other day. He is a personal friend of mine, and for him I entertain the highest respect. He said, in the course of his remarks:

"Why, he told the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] the other day that every corrupt and profligate measure that was pressed in this body met with his support."

Sir, if he had told that, and I had heard it—well, it may be improper for me to say that "I would meet him here or elsewhere." [Laughter.] But I should have taken that course which every true-hearted Yankee takes when his integrity is questioned and his personal character is aspersed. I know that my friend from Illinois did say what he ought not to have said, and I was irritated by what he did say. But I knew the gentleman; I knew the ruling motive for his conduct, that upon which he based his fame; it was economy. He was here as the faithful representative of the Government.

Now, I do not want to be misunderstood, because I say here, that it may go to the country, there could be no more useful man on the Committee on Appropriations than the gentleman from Illinois. His style is not my style. I am rather more liberal and free in the appropriations of the money that flows from the Treasury than the gentleman from Illinois, I have no doubt; still I do that which I deem to be right, and nothing more. I accord to the gentleman from Illinois the same credit that I claim for myself. Only it does seem to me that once in a while, when a poor woman comes here asking the payment of a debt which the Government owes her, or a poor orphan pleads for a few hundred dollars in payment of as just a debt as I should owe if you, sir, had loaned me money, the gentleman from Illinois should not get up in his seat and cry "robbery" and "peculation" and "destruction to the country." Such things do not accord with my taste, though they are in accordance with the taste of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether it is now the order of this body that members shall have the privilege of getting up and slangwhanging each other at pleasure?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] in regard to "slangwhanging" is not in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to another question of order. Is it the rule of this House that a member must speak to the subject under discussion, or may he brow-beat or lecture another member at pleasure?

The SPEAKER. It is the rule that in debate a member must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. MULLINS. That is what I supposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MULLINS. I want it enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MULLINS,] that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] must confine himself to the resolution, which proposes the appointment of a committee to investigate certain charges made against the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I did not quite understand the point raised by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The point was that the official conduct of the gentleman from Illinois in relation to appropriation bills, &c., is not the subject of consideration before the House. The question is the resolution proposing an investigation of the charges made against the character of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] for anything out of order.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has recovered his consistency.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen who have listened to the speeches of other gentlemen will not consider me so far away from the subject as does my friend from Tennessee. That gentleman, in his remarks, is always pertinent to the subject, always lucid, always logical, always eloquent. I have never raised any point of order on him, because I always like to see a gentleman who gets up a good head of steam go through to the end.

But now I will come to the point, and will say, so far as I myself am concerned, that a month or two ago a question came up here in regard to increasing the pay of the employees of the House, which I favored. I naturally would do so.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, I again rise to a point of order. [Laughter.] I have already raised the point that the gentleman should address himself to the subject under discussion; but he is drifting away again upon a different matter, intimating, however, before he drifts away, that I from the South can raise the steam, while he from the far North cannot get steam enough, he is so frozen up. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. No point of order in regard to that remark was made at the time, and it is too late to make it now.

Mr. MULLINS. Well, I insist on the other point, that the gentleman shall confine himself to the subject under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont must address himself to the resolution proposing an investigation of the charges against the character of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will it be in order for me to say a word in regard to the reference made to me on Saturday by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY?]

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, it would not be, if a point of order should be raised, because the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota is not embodied in the resolution or in the pending amendment. Hence it cannot properly be made the subject of discussion.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I should like to say a word or two on that subject, if I thought my fervid friend from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] would not raise a question of order; but I suppose he would do so; and I may as well abandon the effort.

Mr. WINDOM. I am requested by gentlemen all around me to call the previous question, and with one additional remark I will do so.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to add a single sentence?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will merely say, in justice to the gentleman from Illinois, that when he made a remark respecting me, which I thought at the time entirely improper, and to which I replied, the gentleman, in the magnanimity of his heart—

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the rule shall be enforced. The gentleman has been three times ruled out of order, yet he persists in the same line of discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Vermont that if he persists in this line of remark, the point of order having been made three times, he will be in contempt of the rule. The gentleman from Tennessee insists on the point of order and will not waive it.

Mr. MULLINS. I will not.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman permit me to finish the sentence?

Mr. MULLINS. Not a bit; not a bit. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will merely say that the gentleman from Illinois and myself will never have any duel on account of what he may say of me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. After a single remark I will call the previous question. It is a matter of no great importance to me whether the resolution passes or not. If this House believe that it is not worth investigating when a member charges another with venality, fraud, and corruption, of course they will vote accordingly. If the House believe that such charges, coming from where they will, should be investigated, without any reference to their conviction as to their truth or falsity, as a matter of course they will pass this resolution. If the House believe, on the other hand, that the vindication which my colleague made of himself on Saturday was so thorough and complete that, notwithstanding the reassertion of these charges by the gentleman from Illinois, they have no confidence in them and do not care about them, why then, as a matter of course, they will vote down this resolution. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire the consent of the House to speak?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MUNGEN. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended so as to allow the gentleman from Illinois to speak.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. As a question of order, I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the House cannot reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and thereby give the gentleman from Illinois an opportunity to be heard?

The SPEAKER. They can, or they can suspend the rules, this being Monday, in regard to any matter actually before the House at the time.

Mr. WINDOM. Am I not entitled to the floor after the main question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. That rule relates to a member reporting a resolution, a bill. This resolution is not reported.

Mr. WINDOM. I desired to yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that any gentleman shall be entitled to the floor after the main question is ordered upon any bill or resolution reported by him.

Mr. MUNGEN. At the suggestion of friends I will withdraw the objection and allow the gentleman from Illinois to go in.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then, of course, I withdraw the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from Ohio for withdrawing his objection, and I thank the House for the expression of its sentiment in favor of hearing me. I do not propose, however, to make any lengthy speech upon this occasion.

You will bear me witness, Mr. Speaker, that although somewhat impulsive in my nature, I am not very much in the habit of getting into personal collisions and personal quarrels with any man, and I never—so far as my temperament will permit me not to do it—violate the rules of the House. I know how important it is that those rules should be observed. I know how important it is not only to the character of the House, but to the character of individual members of the House, because, if they were confined to these rules and would not transgress them, they would not perhaps bring reproach upon themselves.

I have never, sir, on any occasion, transgressed the rules of the House even in the slightest particular without asking the pardon of the House for such transgression; and if I had transgressed them on Saturday—though the Speaker held, I think, that I did not—but if I had, I should have asked, what it would have been my duty as a Representative and as a man to ask, that I might be pardoned by the House.

I have nothing further to say in relation to the matter, which is, I am glad to say, if pressed by the gentleman from Minnesota, to become a matter of semi-judicial investigation; but as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] declined yielding to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who does not speak here for me, although I am proud to number him among my dearest friends, a man who has served with me in this Hall longer than any other member here, who has been associated with me in a great deal of legislative business, and for whom I cherish the highest regard; as the gentleman from Minnesota declined to yield to him, and he desired to say something upon the subject, I now, sir, in accordance with the rules of the House, yield the floor to him.

Mr. DAWES. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] but I could hardly take the floor under the circumstances. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] could have yielded the floor to me with great propriety; but he did not do so.

Mr. WINDOM. I certainly did yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts for a quarter of an hour.

Mr. DAWES. It is apparent that I cannot take the floor under the present circumstances. While I am sincerely obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for his consideration and regard, I must decline the floor.

The question was upon adopting the preamble and resolution submitted by Mr. WINDOM.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is in order, even pending the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Whatever the resolution may be it cannot now be in order, because the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered upon the resolution of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that my resolution may be read.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be read except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WINDOM. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it in order to move to lay the pending resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. Mr. ROBINSON. Then I make that motion, and ask to have my resolution read, as it embraces the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is never put in the form of a resolution, but is simply a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The question was then taken upon the preamble and resolution offered by Mr. WINDOM, and they were adopted.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEBATES OF SATURDAY, MAY 2.

Mr. SPALDING. I now offer the preamble and resolution which I had read at the Clerk's desk a short time since, as follows:

Whereas the debates of this House of Saturday, the 2d instant, arising upon the personal explanation of the member from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] and joined in by the member from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] are full of personal invective of so gross a nature as to be highly prejudicial to the character of this body for dignity and decorum; and whereas this House was itself in fault in not checking such disorderly debate in its progress, especially as the honorable Speaker did repeatedly intervene in that behalf: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the pleasure of this House that no part of said proceedings be published in the Congressional Globe.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a question of order, and inquire of the Chair if the resolution just read involves a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is privileged, and will refer to a decision made in the Thirty-Seventh or Thirty-Eighth Congress, when, as a privileged resolution, the House adopted an order that anything that should be said by a member after being called to order by the Speaker—and members sometimes persisted in remarks after being called to order, in defiance of the rules—should not be incorporated in the Globe. That is the precedent which occurs to the mind of the Speaker at this moment, the ruling having been made by Mr. Speaker Orr.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] now yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. SPALDING. I decline to yield for that purpose. But I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] on condition that he shall call the previous question when he shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. WINDOM. I would inquire if the ruling of the Chair can apply to the whole debate of Saturday last, or does it apply alone to those remarks to which the Speaker objected?

The SPEAKER. The subject is in the control of the House. If the House see fit, it may resolve that the whole of the day's proceedings shall not be incorporated in the Globe. That is a matter not for the Chair to rule upon, but for the House itself to decide.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair rule that all the proceedings of Saturday can be blotted out?

The SPEAKER. The Chair said nothing at all about blotting anything out. The Chair said he had no doubt about the power of the House to say that the proceedings of any day or of any hour should not be published in the Globe. That is subject to the order of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does that ruling cover the Journal of the House?

The SPEAKER. It does not cover the Journal of the House. And yet the Chair would remind the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] after the lapse of many years, the Senate resolved that they had the right to expunge from their Journal the record of a portion of their proceedings.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think this House would be very glad to expunge very much of its proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot argue that point with the gentleman.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to another question of order. If the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] should be adopted, what will become of the resolution of investigation based upon those proceedings which the House has just adopted?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question for the Chair to determine, but it is one for the House to determine. But the Chair will state that the resolution does not propose to suppress the proceedings as published in the Daily Globe, for they have already been published. This refers to the Congressional Globe, which is not yet published. But the question raised is one for the House to determine; it is not for the Chair to reconcile resolutions which the House may adopt.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a point of order. By reference to page 70 of the Digest it will be seen that it is provided by the act of March 2, 1865, "that the proceedings of Congress shall be published in the Daily Globe of the day subsequent to the day such proceedings were had, and delivered to both Houses at their time of meeting," &c. I submit that these proceedings having been published in the Globe in accordance with the provision of the law, this House cannot, by a resolution, obliterate the record.

Mr. SPALDING. This resolution does not refer to publication in the Daily Globe.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Iowa, which he will see, however, does not affect this resolution. The statute provides "that the proceedings of Congress shall be published in the Daily Globe of the day subsequent to the day such proceedings were had, and delivered to both Houses at their time of meeting." That has been done; the law in this case has been complied with and executed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is, if I am not mistaken—I have not had an opportunity to place my hand upon the act—a provision of law that the proceedings as they appear in the Daily Globe shall be transferred to the Congressional Globe; and the reason for that is, to my mind, very plain.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, with due respect for the gentleman from Iowa, doubts whether he can find any such provision of law. The Clerk will read a single sentence from the Digest, page 100.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The House may judge what are and what are not proceedings."

The SPEAKER. This question as to what are and what are not proceedings is for the House to determine, just as under the Constitution it determines upon the qualifications and election of members.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the question be whether these were proceedings in the House, then that is a different question altogether; but I think there can be no doubt that they were proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot argue the point with the gentleman.

Mr. MUNGLEN. I arise to a point of order. I object to the Chair ruling that the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is in order, because the Chair decided that the gentleman, when they were talking on Saturday, were out of order. The House itself gave the gentleman from Minnesota half an hour additional by its own action, no one objecting. It was the action of the House by which this was done, not the consent of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not fully understand the point of order raised by the gentleman; but, so far as he does understand it, he overrules it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUNGLEN. I will state my point again. The Chair ruled that the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio was in order, because the Chair had called the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to order. I object to the ruling of the Chair, for the reason that the House consented unanimously to give the gentleman a half hour additional to go on with his speech. This was the action not of the Chair, but of the House, and the House having ruled upon this subject it is beyond the control of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MUNGLEN] states that the Chair has ruled that this resolution is privileged because the Chair on Saturday called the gentleman from Minnesota to order, the Chair must be allowed to say that he has made no such decision. He does not base his decision on any such ground whatever, as the gentleman will find by reading the Globe to-morrow morning. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will proceed.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, as the House appears to be impatient—

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman yield to me that I may have a resolution read?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object to the gentleman from Massachusetts yielding.

Mr. DAWES. The House is impatient, and I do not feel at liberty to detain it more than a moment. I must therefore decline to yield.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has corrected his speech; he has apologized to the House for so much of it as violates the decorum of this body.

Mr. BENTON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he understands that the gentleman from Minnesota has changed his speech essentially?

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to go into that matter. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to the fact that he asks this House to put into the permanent record of its proceedings what I propose to read to him and to the House. I dislike, as much as his fastidious colleague does, to reproduce here what his colleague thinks was so indecent on Saturday that it does not become us to have it repeated to-day; but it is due to the House, from the gentleman from Minnesota, after the House has appointed a committee of investigation upon the charges which the gentleman from Illinois has made against him, that he should get up here on the floor of the House and ask to have expunged from its permanent record what I propose to read, and I ask the House if the gentleman from Minnesota treats the House as he ought to do when he sits here silently and allows this to go into the record?

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman if it will not become necessary for me to offer another resolution like this if he reads that speech on this occasion? [Laughter.] I am afraid it will.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Ohio understands his own duty much better than I do.

I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to listen while I read:

"What, if God, in a moment of enthusiasm at one of the gentleman's speeches, were to pluck him to his bosom and leave this wretched nation staggering on in darkness to ruin! I do not wonder that the gentleman's family manifest such an intense desire to get into Congress. I fancy the gentleman—for what would be our loss would be heaven's gain—I fancy the gentleman haranguing the assembled hosts of heaven, cherubims and the seraphims, the angels and the archangels! How he would sail into them!"

Mr. SPALDING. I believe I shall have to resume the floor. [Laughter.] I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he will not defeat the whole object of my resolution by reading that? However, I will yield further.

Mr. BLAINE. You strike it out of Saturday's proceedings and put it in in Monday's!

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the gentleman from Minnesota whether he wants to leave that upon the record after the House has generously, namine contradicente, accorded him a committee of investigation into these charges?

Mr. DONNELLY. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that there is in this no charge of crime, nothing affecting the personal character of the gentleman from Illinois. In the flight of my imagination at that time I transported the gentleman to that realm where we all hope to go, and I not only did that, but I gave him a prominent and conspicuous place in that realm. [Laughter.] I cannot see, Mr. Speaker, what there is to offend the taste of men in such a paragraph as that. I can search the great records of oratory and find a thousand such instances. I think, Mr. Speaker, I did the gentleman from Illinois infinite honor to transport him to heaven. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I will take the floor now. [Laughter.] I will call the gentleman's attention, in the light of what he has just said, to this passage:

"If he lay dead to-morrow in this Chamber, what heart in this body would experience one sincere pang of sorrow?"

Mr. DONNELLY. Does the gentleman ask me for an answer? I only say—

Mr. DAWES. I do not yield to the gentleman now. I am reading the gentleman's speech to him.

"How he would sail in! How he would rout them"—the cherubims and the seraphims, the angels and the archangels—

"how he would rout them, horse, foot, and dragons! How he would attack their motives and fling insinuations at their honesty! And how he would declare for economy, and urge that the wheels of the universe must be stopped because they consumed too much grease!"

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a question of order. It is this, that this language having been held to be out of order, or at least not fit for the Globe, and not parliamentary in character, it can only be introduced here as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I therefore object to his using such language either from the paper or as his own, though I know he would not use it as his own.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he probably decided on Saturday that the remarks which the gentleman from Massachusetts is now reading were out of order; but no gentleman objected, and therefore the gentleman from Massachusetts was allowed to proceed. The gentleman from Iowa now makes the point of order that these remarks are out of order, and the Chair sustains it.

Mr. DAWES. Then, the question is whether they were not so out of order that they ought not to go into the Congressional Globe? I do not pretend to state what they are.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that remarks which are not in order cannot be brought in and made in order by reading them from any printed document.

Mr. GARFIELD. May I ask the Chair if his decision is that it is not in order to read the words that it is moved shall be stricken out? My colleague moves to strike out from the Globe certain words. I ask if it is not in order that the words moved to be stricken out be read?

Mr. WINDOM. The motion is to strike out the whole speech, and not these particular words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is not correct in his statement of fact. The resolution does not propose to strike anything out.

Mr. GARFIELD. It proposes to strike out the whole record.

The SPEAKER. It proposes that what was said in the House on Saturday last shall not be incorporated in the Congressional Globe.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to know if all of this—

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DONNELLY. There is a concluding paragraph of my remarks on Saturday last, upon which the Chair called me to order, and, as I think, very properly, and for which I immediately apologized to the House. I acquiesce in the sense of propriety manifested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I shall ask that that concluding paragraph be omitted from the Congressional Globe. And I will also say—for I desire to do no unfair thing—that if I publish those remarks for distribution in pamphlet form I shall also omit that concluding paragraph from them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask a question of the Chair. I wish to know if all of this does not run on all-fours with the eleventh article of impeachment?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question to which the Chair can respond.

Mr. DAWES resumed the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me one moment to direct his attention to a particular point involved?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has done what I think he ought to have done, and I am very glad he has done it. I now desire to call his attention to one other paragraph, that he may set himself right before the House.

"Why, sir, I can look back and recall"—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] should the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] conclude to strike out the paragraph he is now reading, does the gentleman from Massachusetts intend to pre-serve it in the Globe by thus incorporating it in his remarks?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I think the matter should be arranged privately between the gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. All questions of doubt can be submitted to the House, and if the House or any gentleman desires it the Chair will submit to the House whether this line of argument shall be continued.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to read any more, and, with the consent of the House, I will ask the reporters of the Globe to strike out from my remarks all I have read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to any remarks being stricken out; I object to gentlemen playing fast and loose in this matter.

Mr. DAWES. Very, well; I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to what seems to be a direct attack upon the gentleman from Illinois. He says:

"Why, sir, I can look back and recall how at the opening of almost every Congress the gentleman has got up here and—if the word was parliamentary I would say—howled against the railroad communication between New York and this city, and demanded an air-line railroad, splitting the very heavens with his outcries. Suddenly there came a dead calm,

'And silence, like a poutice, came
'To heal the wounds of sound,'

"and we heard no more upon the subject until the next Congress met."

I would like to have the gentleman state to the House whether he intended to make a charge against the gentleman from Illinois, because that is doing precisely what he claims was done against him in the letter?

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not see that there is any charge there.

Mr. DAWES. There was none intended?

Mr. DONNELLY. Of course not.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] objects to having stricken out from my remarks any of those improper passages from the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota which I have read, then I will ask unanimous consent of the House to have them stricken out.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to any remarks being stricken out; I want them to go to the country just as they are, so that they may know precisely what we are doing.

Mr. DAWES. Then I give notice that as soon as this matter is disposed of I will move to suspend the rules in order that I may omit from my remarks, as published in the Globe, what I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. It is in order at this time to move to suspend the rules for any purpose connected with or growing out of the subject before the House.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not desire to make any extended remarks.

Mr. SPALDING. I resume the floor, and call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understood my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] to have yielded the floor altogether to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on condition that he should call the previous question when he was through.

Mr. SPALDING. But he does not call it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to consent to yield to me for an inquiry.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I want to call the attention of the House to a matter connected with this, for fear we may involve ourselves in some great absurdity. I will not argue the question now before the House further than to say that it seems to me better to have an authentic official record of all we do and say here, for information or warning in the future, than to leave it entirely in the shape of such exaggerated and misrepresented accounts as will be sure to go forth. So much for the official record.

But sir there is something more than that in this case, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. We have just passed a resolution in which we cite from this debate, as the ground upon which that resolution is based, remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois, and now it is proposed to suppress that record, to wipe it out, to take away the very evidence upon which we have based the resolution which we have but a moment ago adopted. It seems to me that such action on the part of the House would be—I will not say absurd, lest the term may be considered disrespectful, and I may be called to order; but it would put us in a position which might possibly induce outsiders to say that we are acting absurdly, and endeavoring to "cover up our tracks." Whatever the character of the things said and done here, I hold it is better for us, better for the country, better in every sense that, such as they are, a record should be made of them, either for instruction or warning, as the case may be, hereafter—for praise or reproof as they may deserve the one or the other—than that we should be engaged in the idle attempt to wipe out history, leaving that history without the authentic and official record by which it should be perpetuated, and allowing it to be preserved in garbled accounts furnished by those who are not officially entitled to speak for us.

But, sir, I arose more particularly for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the absurd attitude in which it seems to me we shall place ourselves if at one moment we pass a resolution based upon certain things set forth in the record kept by law in the Congressional Globe and the next moment turning around and wiping out the evidence upon which was based the resolution adopted by us.

Mr. GARFIELD. With the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I desire to say one word of explanation. In my remark a few moments ago I was actuated by the view that we should be doing badly to strike out the record, not that I wish to give an undue license to debate, or that the Speaker should make latitudinarian rulings and permit an undue range of discussion. I have been very sorry for my part that I did not interfere, as I think I ought to have done, on Saturday, and prevented a part at least of the improper remarks then made.

Mr. HIGBY. With the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts I desire to make a single suggestion. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in order to carry out the full intent and purpose of this resolution it should embrace the debate of to-day also. The gentleman from Massachusetts has been dwelling very lengthily upon the speech made on Saturday by the gentleman from Minnesota, and has been reiterating the most offensive portions of that speech.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DRIGGS. I rise to a question of order. As I understand, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] received the floor from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] on the condition that when he got through with his remarks he should call the previous question. He has not complied with that condition, and I do not see by what right he now holds the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. He has not got through yet.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain this question as a question of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts must judge for himself as to the conditions on which he obtained the floor and the right under which he holds it.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of this body for five years. I have never had the slightest collision with any member of the House. I have never, I believe, during my whole lifetime assailed with abuse any man. I think I can almost say, as good old Abraham Lincoln said, "I have never willingly planted a thorn in the breast of any man." If I have sinned in this case, Mr. Speaker, it is because I have suffered. I have the highest respect for the members of this House, and for none more than for my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] Although I do not think my flight of imagination last Saturday, conveying the gentleman from Illinois to the realms of eternal bliss, was any imputation upon him or was in any sense a violation of parliamentary propriety, (and I think the Speaker has fallen unintentionally into a trifling error on this point, for I believe the Globe will show that he did not call me to order upon that branch of the subject,) yet, Mr. Speaker, in deference to the judgment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that there may be no further offense to the good taste of the House in this matter, I am willing to go a step further and strike out even that paragraph from the report of my remarks.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order. If the gentleman from Minnesota has got my colleague into the regions of bliss I object to his bringing him down. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Although I am under a pledge to call the previous question on this resolution, yet after the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota, I think it has answered its purpose, and I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will withdraw it. Before resigning the floor I will yield it to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the gentleman from Minnesota has withdrawn the offensive portions of his speech and his imputations, I withdraw entirely what I said in reply.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I now ask leave to withdraw from the Globe the extracts from the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota which I have incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We object to the Globe being mutilated.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I withdraw it.

Mr. DONNELLY. In the present temper of the House, I would ask whether it would be proper for the House to imitate the illustrious example that was set at the other end of the avenue and go out and take a drink? [Great laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I belong, Mr. Speaker, to the temperance society. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer the question of the gentleman from Minnesota, but he is always gratified at the settlement of such differences as these between members upon the floor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petition of citizens of Venango county, Pennsylvania, praying for the removal of all taxes from rock oil.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 5, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

ADMISSION TO IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to make a motion that the members of the United States Medical Association, now assembled in this city, be allowed seats in the gallery.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the medical institution or society have leave to occupy the galleries.

Mr. SUMNER. Without tickets.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the motion?

Mr. CONKLING. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to permit the members of the Medical Association to come into the galleries of the Senate without tickets.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to know how many there are of the association, and whether it is possible that they can be accommodated in the galleries.

Mr. CAMERON. I will say in reply that the number will not amount to more than one or two hundred, and I am satisfied the Sergeant-at-Arms can accommodate them in the galleries.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They number six or seven hundred.

Mr. DRAKE. How are we to know who the members of that association are if they are to come in without tickets. I object to the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania in its present form.

Mr. SUMNER. It is too late to object.

Mr. DRAKE. I object to its adoption; I do not object to its being acted upon. The vote has not yet been taken upon it. If the resolution is to be adopted in its present form then every man who chooses to present himself at the doors of the Capitol and say that he is a member of that association can come in, and who is to prevent him? If they are to come in at all by the grace of the Senate it should be by tickets provided for them and given to them at their place of meeting. But, sir, they are to meet to-day, and this is probably the last day that the argument of this case will proceed. Of what avail is it to pass this resolution here when those gentlemen are to be at their own place of meeting during the very hours of the session of the Senate? I do not think it is expedient for us thus to throng the galleries with two or three hundred additional people when the whole number of tickets are given out to the extent that persons can be accommodated in the gallery. I have great respect for that association, but I do not see that we are to gain anything but confusion by granting them this privilege. The Senators and Representatives from the States from which these gentlemen come can furnish them with tickets so far as it may be necessary that they should have them.

Mr. CAMERON. The resolution, I believe, was passed prior to these remarks of my friend from Missouri.

Mr. DRAKE. The resolution has not passed. The negative was not put.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I think it would be better for him to devise some plan of getting them in. To my mind there is no difficulty about it at all. It can be done under the direction of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and he will give them tickets or devise some better mode. We shall not be obliged to accommodate more than two hundred, and why not let them come here?

Mr. GRIMES. I rise to inquire to what hour the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not know that I understood the question of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. I simply rose to inquire to what hour the Senate yesterday, sitting as a court of impeachment, adjourned to meet to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twelve o'clock. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was not agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The President pro tempore then vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock and nine minutes p. m.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 5, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The reading of the Journal of yesterday was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the committee of investigation on charges against Hon. IGNATIUS DONNELLY, appointed under the resolution of the House of yesterday: NATHANIEL P. BANKS, of Massachusetts; FRANCIS THOMAS, of Maryland; LUKE P. POLAND, of Vermont; JOHN A. GRISWOLD, of New York; AUSTIN BLAIR, of Michigan; GEORGE W. WOODWARD, of Pennsylvania, and JAMES B. BECK, of Kentucky.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I am requested by my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. I presume there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to debate it will have to be postponed until the House returns from the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. If objection be made, I give notice that I will offer it on the return of the House from the Senate.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee ordered by the House yesterday be also charged, under the authority then given them, with the investigation of the allegations made on Friday by the member from New York, Mr. BROOKS, in the words following:

"Sir, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will never, never forgive me because I extorted from him, or was the means of extorting from him, through the Treasury Department here and through the courts in New York, $60,000 in gold which he had extorted from a New Yorker in New Orleans, when he had command there—a sum of money which he was obliged by the courts of New York to pay back, not exactly in the gold which he appropriated in New Orleans when it was at $2 80, but in paper as legal tender. It is because of this act of mine upon the floor of this House, when he was a commanding general and I as a public man exposed his acts here, that I am assailed, as I have been by him to-day, and upon other occasions elsewhere."

Which allegation, if true, with the innuendoes with which they were made, ought to affect the position of the member charged; and if the charge is false, and not known to be true by the member making it, the House may take such order as may be necessary and proper to protect members of the House from false charges.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this is a question of privilege, as it affects the character of a member of the House. It is open, however, to objection to its consideration at the present time.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object to the consideration of the resolution now, if—

Mr. ARNELL. I object to its consideration.

Mr. DAWES. Then I give notice that I will present it on the return of the House from the Senate, and I wish to say that I offer it at the request of my colleague, and not because I deem it necessary.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNELL] objects. The Chair gives notice that business will be transacted on the return of the House from the Senate.

Some moments afterward,

Mr. ARNELL said: I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The SPEAKER. If there be no other objection the question will be upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not object if I can be permitted to add to it another question of inquiry in connection with the same matter.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] can present his as a separate matter at another time.

Mr. BROOKS. I prefer to do it in connection with this and now.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot consent to that.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I object to the consideration of the resolution now.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the matter will be resumed upon the return of the House from the Senate this afternoon.

REPORT ON MINING.

Mr. SCOTFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the same number of copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a report by James W. Taylor upon gold and silver mines and mining east of the Rocky mountains, be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, as are ordered of the report of J. Ross Browne on the mineral resources of the Pacific States and Territories, and that said reports be bound together.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. There will be business to be transacted this afternoon upon the return of the House from the Senate.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At four o'clock and ten minutes p. m. the Committee of the Whole returned to the Hall, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; progress has been made in the trial, and the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, has adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock m.

W. H. SHIRLEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Quartermaster General on the claim of W. H. Shirley, in response to a request from the Committee of Claims; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

WRECK OF STEAMER SCOTLAND.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a House resolution of the 2d of March, a report by a board of United States engineers on the condition of the wreck of the steamer Scotland, now lying in New York harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MANUFACTURERS' NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1035) to authorize the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1036) to amend the sixth section of the act of July 4, 1864, on the subject of pensions, so as to authorize pensions to be granted in certain cases from the date of the discharge or death of the soldier; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President was delivered to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HAWKINS asked and obtained leave of absence for four days.

LAND GRANT TO MINNESOTA.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1037) making a grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad from Taylor's Falls, via Saint Cloud, to the western boundary of said State; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENTS IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to inform this House of the number and names of clerks appointed in his Department since the 1st of April last, and by whom recommended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to the form of the resolution.

Mr. MILLER. Then I give notice that I will offer it on Monday next.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. During the proceedings to-day, before the House proceeded to the bar of the Senate, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] submitted the following resolution as a question of privilege:

Resolved, That the select committee ordered by the House yesterday be also charged, under the authority then given them, with the investigation of the allegations made on Friday by the member from New York, [Mr. BROOKS], in the words following:

"Sir, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will never, never forgive me because I extorted from him, or was the means of extorting from him, through the Treasury Department here and through the courts in New York, $60,000 in gold which he had extorted from a New Yorker in New Orleans, when he had command there—a sum of money which he was obliged by the courts of New York to pay back, not exactly in the gold which he appropriated in New Orleans when it was at $2 80, but in paper as legal tender. It is because of this act of mine upon the floor of this House, when he was a commanding general and I was a public man exposed his acts here, that I am assailed, as I have been by him to-day, and upon other occasions elsewhere."

Which allegations, if true, with the innuendoes with which they were made, ought to affect the position of the member charged; and, if the charge is false and not known to be true by the member making it, the House may take such order as may be necessary and proper to protect members of the House from false charges.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair rule that that resolution is privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] objected to the consideration of the resolution except on some conditions. The question, therefore, is, Will the House now consider it? If no objection is made, the gentleman from New York will be permitted to state briefly the reasons for his objection.

Mr. BROOMALL. Let him have five minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in connection with this proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], to have also investigated other allegations made in the debate referred to. Among other charges which were made against me on that occasion was one involving a question of veracity between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and a person in New York to whom he referred as plaintiff in a certain lawsuit against me. The allegation was—

"Some time ago there was a case where one Clarke"

Mr. DAWES. I suggest that upon the question whether the House will consider the resolution the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is not in order in debating the merits of something else.

The SPEAKER. The House has by unanimous consent allowed the gentleman from New York five minutes to state the ground of his objection. The Chair understood him this morning to object to the consideration of this resolution unless there should be added to it something which he did not then state.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suppose the time occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will not come out of the five minutes of the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will note the time, and will do full justice to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said in the debate the other day that—

"Some time ago there was a case where one Clarke sued a fellow by the name of Brooks for part ownership in the New York Express, and there was a difficulty between Erastus Brooks and the other partner about a division of the spoils. They brought him [BUTLER] the case and showed him that the two Brookses had robbed this Clarke. He [BUTLER] said he did not love the firm; he would have nothing to do with it; it was a nasty affair and not so forth as guano; he saw the case in court and saw the Brookses beaten."

I hold in my hand a telegram from Mr. Clarke to myself, which was transmitted to me yesterday, and I have also before me a letter addressed to my brother, Hon. Erastus Brooks, of New York. The letter reads as follows:

NEW YORK, May 4, 1868.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the "Express suit" alluded to by General BUTLER on Friday last, allow me to say that it was never offered to him by me, directly or indirectly, and that I never heard his name connected with it until Saturday last, on reading the debate of the day before. His entire statement has not the shadow of truth to rest upon.

Yours, truly, S. T. CLARKE.

HON. ERASTUS BROOKS.

In connection with this I desire to say that Mr. S. T. Clarke was the plaintiff in this suit against me; and I desire to say further, in justice to him and his honorable profession as a journalist, that he is a leading and large proprietor of the New York Tribune and is one of the editors—the money editor—of that paper. The telegram to which I have referred is to the same effect as the letter. It is in these words:

NEW YORK, May 4, 1868.

BUTLER's story about the Express suit is without a shadow of truth. It was never offered to him by me in any form. S. T. CLARKE.

What I want the committee now to investigate is the question of veracity between Mr. Clarke, an editor of the New York Tribune, and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] This question of veracity interests the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts far more than it does me. I would like to have it settled at the same time with the other question with regard to the gentleman.

I cannot comprehend why the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], who has offered this resolution, should insist upon an investigation of the circumstances connected with the payment of the comparatively small sum of $60,000, passing into the hands of a military commander amid the scenes of war during which there was very likely to be much rapacity—I cannot understand the logical distinction in the gentleman's mind which makes him demand an investigation in regard to that $60,000, when the other day, upon a question involving the conduct of the same honorable member, his colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER], as a manager on the part of this House in the impeachment, he voted no upon my proposition to appoint a special committee to investigate the Alta Vela controversy, involving, as I then remarked, over a million of dollars. Why the gentleman should feel so deeply interested in this investigation as to $60,000 and so indifferent as to a matter involving $1,000,000, and at the same time involving the character of the House and the character of the honorable member, his colleague, it is not within my power to determine. If this matter of the gold is to be investigated it seems to me necessary that it should be followed up by other investigations connected with the whole administration of General BUTLER as commander of the New Orleans or Louisiana department.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. He has occupied five minutes since the interruption of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to have less than five minutes more to complete my explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to granting the gentleman from New York further time to complete his explanation?

Mr. ARNELL. I object.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider the resolution of privilege introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts? This question is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

Mr. CARY. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House. The question is, Will the House now consider it?

The resolution was again read.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to state to the House why I offer this resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. For five minutes?

Mr. DAWES. I do not want two minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the same time allowed the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DAWES. I offered this resolution at the request of my colleague, upon whose character for integrity the charge cited reflects. It is for the House to say, when a member of the House makes a charge against a fellow-member, and that fellow-member asks for an investigation of the truth of the charge, whether they shall grant it. I do it entirely at the request of my colleague, and not because I myself or any of his colleagues believe there is any ground for that charge even sufficient for an investigation. I call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It does not need the previous question, as the question is not debatable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to debate it unless the House gives unanimous consent. I ask for five minutes to make some suggestions, and I would rather have them now than after the House has declined to consider and act on the resolution. However, at one or the other points of time I desire to have a moment or two to make a remark on this subject. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for five minutes.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object.

Mr. MYERS. If it be not distasteful to the House I insist on my motion to adjourn. I think that we had better adjourn.

SOUTH CAROLINA AND ARKANSAS ELECTIONS.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House a brief message from the President of the United States. If it gives rise to debate it will be withdrawn and presented hereafter regularly.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the motion to adjourn, so we may dispose of this matter to-day. It is the understanding, if this message gives rise to debate, it is to go over.

The SPEAKER. So the Chair has stated.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting documents relating to elections in South Carolina and Arkansas; which, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

CHARGES AGAINST A MEMBER—AGAIN.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to read a resolution I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to read a resolution which I consider necessary to a proper investigation.

Mr. DAWES. When the House decides to entertain my resolution I will have the control of it.

Mr. BROOKS. I presume there will be no objection to entertaining the resolution; there is none on this side.

The question was then put; and the House decided to receive and consider the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I will now listen to the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee be directed to bring before them the report of the special commissioners, Major General William F. Smith and James T. Brady, esq., of New York, appointed by President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton to investigate the administration of the military government in New Orleans during the war, and especially for the testimony of B. T. Smith, Jacob Barker, and W. W. Watson relating to the administration of General Butler and his connection in the trade of Lakes Borgne and Ponchartrain with his brother, A. J. Butler.

Mr. DAWES. I consider it altogether unnecessary to instruct a committee of the character of the one announced this morning as to the mode and method of discharging their duties. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to make an inquiry which might influence my vote upon this question. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraw the previous question to allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. DAWES made a gesture of dissent.

Mr. CARY. I ask permission of the gentleman to offer an amendment.

Mr. DAWES again made a gesture of dissent.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 82, noes 21.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] now an hour to discuss this question?

The SPEAKER. He has not, not having reported the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to make a few remarks to the House—not to exceed five minutes.

Mr. COVODE. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, we have made a great many mistakes by not allowing discussion.

Mr. BOYER. May I be allowed to make an inquiry of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. If it is a parliamentary question the Chair will answer it, but not otherwise.

Mr. BOYER. It is this: I desire to know whether, under the pending resolution, if adopted, in relation to the misappropriation of gold, it will be legitimate to inquire into the misappropriation of spoons or other plate, provided its material be silver? [Laughter, and cries of "Order."]

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order, nor is that a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair stated that he would answer a parliamentary inquiry, but the gentleman did not make one.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to modify his resolution so as to cover the entire administration of his colleague [Mr. BUTLER] at New Orleans. There is no reason why we should investigate a single subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must first ask the consent of the House before he makes any remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was asking that consent.

Mr. DRIGGS. I object.

Mr. DAWES. It is unnecessary to cover more than the charge made against my colleague.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution. I want a full investigation if we have any.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only four members voting therefor.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TENTH ARTICLE OF IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. CARY. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the resolution which I sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk commenced to read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas this House, in the tenth article of impeachment, charged Andrew Johnson—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I make the point of order that that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presents it as a question of privilege.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I object to its being read until the Chair determines that it is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has to be read to the House. If it is a question of privilege, the question will then be whether the House will now consider it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] is on the floor with a question which has to be considered.

Mr. CARY. I simply ask that the resolution be read. If it is out of order, I do not want to press it.

The SPEAKER. It is to be read as the Chair has stated. The gentleman from Ohio is upon the floor and could have read it at his own seat, and no gentleman can make a motion to adjourn until it has been read.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Is it not in order for the Speaker to examine the resolution and see if it is a question of privilege before it is read?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The usual custom, when a member states that he rises to a question of privilege, is for the resolution to be read at the Clerk's desk or at the member's seat, and then the Chair rules upon it. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas this House, in the tenth article of impeachment, charged Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, with a high misdemeanor in office, in that he had made intemperate, inflammatory, and scandalous harangues, which were peculiarly indecent and unbecoming:

Resolved, That in view of the exhibition on this floor on Friday, Saturday, and Monday last, the select committee report as speedily as practicable as to the propriety of ordering the managers to withdraw the tenth article from the further consideration of the high court of impeachment.

Mr. CARY. I mean the select committee ordered on yesterday. I drew the resolution in this form because I intended it as an amendment to the resolution authorizing the committee. I will modify the resolution by inserting after the words "the select committee" the words "announced this morning."

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this is not a question of privilege. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] had moved, in place of this, a resolution instructing the managers to withdraw any article of impeachment, there would be no question of his right to do so, subject to the decision of the House, whether they would consider the resolution.

Mr. CARY. I will modify the resolution as suggested by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then hold that the resolution is privileged, subject to the order of the House.

Mr. PILE. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, Will the House now consider the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] who has moved that the House adjourn, could not take the floor from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY,] who still holds the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, from the fact, as the gentleman well knows, that no gentleman can hold the floor on an undebatable question. The question—Will the House now consider the resolution?—is undebatable, and therefore no gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. I ask consent to make a statement to the House. I have been notified by the Clerk of the House that I have been appointed upon the select committee—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to any debate.

Mr. BANKS. I have a right to make the statement.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be made pending the question of privilege before the House, if objection is made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw any objection I have made. I will not be as illiberal as gentlemen were to me.

Mr. BANKS. I have been notified by the Clerk of the House that I have been appointed—

Mr. CARY. I object. I want my resolution considered and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider the resolution? upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] has called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 92; not one fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SCOTFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 25, noes 85.

So (one fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHURCHILL: The petition of John J. Wolcott, Samuel F. Case, Willis S. Nelson, and 207 others, citizens of Fulton, New York, asking for a reduction of the expenses of the Government and thereby of the burdens of taxation, and also for such readjustment of the revenue laws as to keep the balance of trade in favor of this country.

Also, the petition of Whitmore Kinyon and 49 others, individuals and firms, manufacturers and dealers in lumber in New York and Brooklyn, asking that the duties on imported lumber be changed from ad valorem to specific.

Also, the petition of J. Benedict & Son and others, lumber dealers in Albany, New York, asking that duties on imported lumber be changed from ad valorem to specific.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: The resolutions of the Buffalo Board of Trade, recommending the constructing of a "straight cut" from Lake Michigan to Mohoake river.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, urging the reduction of the tax upon whisky to fifty cents per gallon, and that the tax upon tobacco be levied upon the plant.

By Mr. SITGREAVES: The petition to establish a post route in New Jersey from Neshanic, via Pleasant Valley and Rock Mills, to Blamenburg.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 6, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM HOWE, of Boston, Massachusetts.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

ACCOUNTS OF SECRETARY OF SENATE.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, who were directed by a resolution of the 15th of April to examine and investigate the accounts of John W. Forney, Secretary of the Senate, submitted a report, accompanied by testimony and tabular statements, which was ordered to be printed; and a motion by Mr. BUCKALEW to print five hundred extra copies was referred to the Committee on Printing.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 6, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the Coast Survey report for the year 1867; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed twenty-five hundred copies extra of the report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey for the year 1867, of which one thousand shall be for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and fifteen hundred for the use of the members of this House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is, Will the House consider the resolution offered yesterday, as a question of privilege, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY?] On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered; and, as the taking of the yeas and nays will consume some time, it will be postponed till after the return of the House from the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then it is understood there will be business this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. Business will be transacted on the return of the House to its Hall.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to give notice that when the pending question shall be disposed of I shall move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to enable some gentlemen to make speeches.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say that I propose this afternoon to make a personal explanation with reference to the subject embraced in the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] which was very properly laid on the table the other day.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, according to order, and proceed to the bar of the Senate, following the managers and preceded by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who will be attended by the Clerk and acting Doorkeeper. There will be business to be transacted this afternoon upon the return of the House from the Senate.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, in obedience to the order, and proceeded to the bar of the Senate.

At a quarter to four o'clock p. m. the Speaker resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The House of Representatives resumes its session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I inquire whether it will be in order for me to make report as chairman of the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the rule under which the House has been acting. It will be found in the Journal of the House of March 20, 1868.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. BOUTWELL, from the board of managers in the matter of the impeachment of the President of the United States, the rules having been suspended for that purpose, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That on the days when the Senate shall sit for the trial of the President upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives the House, in Committee of the Whole, will attend with the managers at the bar of the Senate at the hour named for the commencement of the proceedings."

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that under this resolution, the Senate having gone into secret session in their own Chamber for deliberation, and it being impossible for the managers and the House as in the Committee of the Whole to attend at the bar of the Senate, it is the duty of the House to return to its Hall, and here, as the House of Representatives, to transact business while waiting for any message from the Senate after the doors of that body have been reopened.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. It is the decision of the Chair as to the action of the House; does the gentleman from Wisconsin take an appeal?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not appeal, although that decision covers a point of order that I desired myself to raise. I notice that that resolution prevents us from doing any business while the Senate is in session considering the question of impeachment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point that the first thing to be done is to receive the report of the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide one point at a time.

The Chair decides on the point raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin that the resolution says in express terms that the House shall attend with its managers at the bar of the Senate, which, of course, it can only do when the doors are reopened.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, allow me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Chair has finished, and he will then allow the gentleman. The Chair gave notice before the House went to the Senate that on its return business would be transacted. The House of Representatives cannot be expected to be in an ante-room of the Senate. They are in attendance at the bar of the Senate or in their own Hall; and therefore the Chair rules that, as the doors of the Senate were closed upon the House and it was impossible for the House to be in attendance at the bar of the Senate, the House resumed its session in its own Hall.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to suggest a fact; and, sir, I do so without any intention of any disrespect to the Chair, or any disposition to resist any decision which the Chair may make, and without any purpose to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I was in the Senate when the order was made which convened them in secret session, and I understood it to be simply this, that the Senate would then consider in secret session the pending question. That question may be determined in five minutes, and the doors of the Senate may then be thrown open, and under the order of the House the House may then be required to be in attendance at the bar of the Senate. I insist, therefore, that this House cannot, under the circumstances, do any business now without violation of its own order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he accepts his suggestion that the point is not made with any intent or desire to differ with the Chair. The Chair took some time to examine this resolution, and after consultation with others who are excellent parliamentarians he has no doubt of the fact in his own mind that while the Senate is engaged in secret deliberation for one or four and twenty hours it could not be expected or required of the House to remain in the Senate corridors, and the Speaker, as representing the House, could not consent to it without the direct order of the House. The Chair therefore thinks, the order having been made before the House proceeded to the Senate, that when the House returns business should be transacted; and the Senate having excluded the House from its Chamber, as it has a right to do under its rules, the House must therefore return to the Hall and await a message from the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. In case the Senate should open its doors again to the House, or if its doors should now be open, I would inquire whether this House can be considered as in session when by our own order we are supposed to be in the presence of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly the point upon which the Chair differs with the gentleman—that the House cannot be supposed to be, even theoretically, at the bar of the Senate when it is excluded. The House of Representatives, if it exists at all, must be somewhere.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise for the purpose of getting a ruling from the Chair. I move that we now adjourn. That will bring up the question upon which I desire the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn admits of no point of order; it must be decided by a vote of the House if the Speaker entertains it. But the Chair first entertains the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBINSON. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole has the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. He has, and is waiting the conclusion of the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, made the following report: The Committee of the Whole have, according to order, attended the managers to the bar of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment for the trial of Andrew Johnson; and the argument having been closed and the Senate having ordered its doors to be shut for deliberation, the committee thereupon returned with the managers to the Hall of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now entertain the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON. For the purpose of raising the question whether we have a regular session of the House I move that we do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the Chair desires to lay before the House some executive communications.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the President of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, for the years 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, and 1866, in compliance with House resolution of February 4, 1868; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON DELAWARE BAY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Light-House Board, relative to the erection of a permanent light-house on Crossledge shoal, in Delaware bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House adjourns it could not respond to an invitation of the Senate to return, if the doors should be reopened. A majority of the House can, however, adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. At the request of several gentlemen I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ROSS. Have we not executed the order of the House in regard to attending the impeachment trial?

The SPEAKER. That is not properly before the House now.

Mr. ROSS. I think we are through, myself.

The SPEAKER. The pending question before the House is, Will the House now consider the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY?] but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. For how long a time?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will not take long.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I only desire to know how long.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Say ten minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yesterday I asked for five minutes and the House refused. But I will not insist upon any such rule.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask a question. Yesterday when we adjourned the yeas and nays were ordered on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] in reference to withdrawing the tenth article of impeachment. It seems to me this order cannot be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection.

Mr. CARY. Will that carry over my resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will not. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio will be the next thing in order after the personal explanation. It will not lose its place. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania having ten minutes for personal explanation? The Chair hears no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, personal explanations are not to my taste; but in the case of Alta Vela, my co-managers having deemed it their duty to explain, it may be thought a suspicious circumstance that I have not done so. When that question was before the House it was laid on the table before it reached me. I will now briefly state all I know of the matter.

Some time early in the session some person, whose name I do not recollect, asked me what was the law of nations in case the citizens of one country were in the quiet possession of an island and had been forcibly ejected by another nation in behalf of other claimants. I had not forgotten the heated discussion which took place relative to the Falkland islands, a pile of barren rocks of no value, except so far as the national honor was concerned; and I answered that the nation whose citizens had been forcibly ejected would be justified in reinstating them, so that they might settle their title in the ordinary way. I declined to give a written opinion, as I was not in the practice of the law. I heard no more of the subject until about two months ago. General GARFIELD called at my seat with a paper or letter which he said was a copy of the opinion I had given, and asked me if I would sign it. I took it without reading and put my name to it with others. I did not then know its contents, but having since read it I have nothing to retract. I never heard of it any more until within a few weeks, when it was produced in the Senate by Mr. Nelson, one of the counsel for the President. At the time I signed it I had no idea it was to be taken to the President, nor had I any idea that Judge Black or his son had anything to do with it. Had I known that fact, however, it would not have altered my action. I have known Judge Black for more than thirty years, and, aside from his unfortunate politics, I have known him to be a very able and honorable lawyer and upright judge, who has hardly been equaled by any member of the bench.

This letter, I find, was written by General BUTLER to J. W. Shaffer; when written I do not know. I signed a copy sometime afterward. It simply gives his opinion as to the right of regaining possession of Alta Vela. It is no where addressed to the President or any of his counsel, or to any member of his Government. It makes no allusion to the impeachment, nor does it contain any insinuation of clemency on any condition. If it was ever shown to him, his counsel, or Cabinet, it was without the sanction of the writers, at least so far as I am concerned. What, then, had this letter to do with the prosecution which Mr. Nelson was discussing? It was not addressed to the President, his advisers, or kindred, did not make the most distant reference to any one of the charges in the articles of impeachment; nor could it be construed by any honest man to have any connection or bearing upon the prosecution. It had not been given in evidence, nor referred to until some days after the testimony was closed, and when counsel were summing up. I think no honorable man would have used it to assail the motives of brother counsel, as it was dragged in irrelevantly and illegally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that parliamentary rules prohibit unfavorable discussion in regard to what transpires in the other Chamber—the Senate Chamber. The Chair, therefore, does not think that these remarks are parliamentary.

Mr. GETZ. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does this out of respect for the other branch of Congress, which might complain of personal strictures here on what occurred there.

Mr. BANKS. I would suggest to the Speaker that this is a matter which transpired in the presence of both Houses, and, therefore, may very properly be alluded to in this Chamber.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I only hope some one will be allowed to respond in regard to such facts as they think are misstated.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope so. I did not intend to misstate any facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will proceed, there being no objection.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I was saying that when I look at the speech of the gentleman I can easily forgive him. His speech does not profess to touch the question of impeachment. It lumbers through two mortal days, and thinly veneers a very great number of subjects, lying in different hemispheres, but never touches the question at issue. How, then, could he avoid embarrassing us in his greasy career?

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think these remarks are within the parliamentary law.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, let them go on.

Mr. RANDALL. They only hit back.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have nothing to say—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Under the ruling of the Chair, I object.

Mr. ARNELL. And I object.

Mr. HIGBY. And so do I.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the Chair that this has nothing to do with the Senate or with anything that has taken place in the Senate, but in the court.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I suggest that this thing did not take place in the Senate, but in open court.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the Chair can turn to the parliamentary rule in the Digest he will have it read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania intends to withdraw the tenth article of impeachment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I intend to withdraw everything that is unparliamentary. This was an assault made upon us by a counsel, and not by a member of either branch of the Legislature. I therefore supposed I had a right to answer, as an individual, his attack as an individual upon me.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I thought the language was very much like that referred to in the tenth article of impeachment against the President. It was for that reason I suggested what I did. His "greasy career" sounds to me a great deal like "swinging around the circle," and "on the verge of the Government."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the rule from page 77 of the Manual, in the Digest, read by the Clerk. The Chair desires to preserve the courtesy between the two branches of Congress. The Senate are sitting, under their constitutional power, as a court to try the pending impeachment. It is the Senate of the United States with a presiding officer called in, because the President himself is on trial. But as was held by the managers during the trial, and correctly in the opinion of the Chair, it is "still the Senate of the United States," though engaged in trying the President.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Nelson is not a Senator.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majority on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independence, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses."

The SPEAKER. The object of this rule as laid down by Grey—the Chair has not May's Parliamentary Practice now before him to refer to—the object is that there may be a good understanding and courtesy between the two branches which together form the Congress.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman can wait, the Chair will conclude what he was saying.

Mr. MULLINS. I can and will wait with pleasure.

The SPEAKER. This is a subject upon which the Chair is compelled to rule. The House will see at once that if remarks of this character can be made in the House of Representatives, in regard to what has transpired in the Senate, sitting for the trial of the President, remarks of equally as severe a character may be made by Senators as to the conduct of the House, its Speaker, its chairman, its managers, or any one else connected with this trial, the inevitable result of which would be, as Grey states, to make "misunderstanding between the two branches." The Chair therefore thinks that these remarks do not come within the parliamentary rule.

The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MULLINS] desires to make some statement in connection with this subject, which he will have pleasure in hearing.

Mr. MULLINS. I have ever been an individual disposed to abide by rules, well knowing that no parliamentary body can be kept in bounds without rules; nor can any deliberative body, let alone any parliamentary body, be kept in bounds without rules. I am and ever have been willing to conform to them. And pardon me if I suggest an idea. [Laughter.] Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the gentleman from Tennessee have leave to express an idea.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is about expressing it.

Mr. MULLINS. I asked pardon before I suggested the idea. I asked that I might be pardoned for suggesting an idea; and now you will have it. It is that I differ from the ruling of the Chair. If I may be allowed the expression, this is in my mind no attack upon the Senate, or anything the Senate has done. It is but a defense—

Mr. PILE. I object to this debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, and desires to hear them.

Mr. MULLINS. The remarks ruled out of order are but a defense of one of the members of this body against an attack made upon him and other managers by one of the counsel of the President, who, while appearing at the bar of the Senate, is not himself a member of the Senate. That, I think, constitutes this an exception from the rule. As I believe that attack was made by a counsel of the President, brought forward to defend his cause, directly assailing the character of a member of this House, I feel bound to stand by any member so situated, be he upon this or the other side of the House, in order that he may be able to defend his character against any outsider. Had it been a Senator who had spoken I would be the last man on the continent of America who would permit any invasion of his rights as a free man, or in his senatorial capacity, or allow his character to be brought into discussion, or to be made the subject of wanton attack. I think, therefore, there is a grand exception between a Senator and a counsel for the President. This is an attack made by the counsel for the President upon the character and veracity of one of our own body. Hence this is an exception to the general rule. I ask pardon for having differed to some extent with the Chair as to the parliamentary rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MULLINS.] On page 74 of Barclay's Digest the rule will be found laid down again, as follows:

"It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House."

The Chair, therefore, still holds the opinion he has already expressed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I certainly do not desire to differ with the Speaker in his rulings. In this case there has been an attack by a counsel, not a member of either branch of Congress, upon one not a member of the body he was addressing. It was in answer to this attack that I prepared these remarks, which, however, I have no desire to introduce if they are thought to infringe at all the order of debate. I therefore withdraw them.

Mr. PILE. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman proposes to withdraw what has already been said and has been taken down by the reporters.

The SPEAKER. The House will understand that the only desire of the Chair in this matter is that no misunderstanding between the two Houses may grow up in consequence of strictures on the floor of the House in regard to the action of the Senate, or language which the Senate has allowed in the course of the prolonged trial in which it is at present engaged. The Chair in this, as he has on other personal questions recently, rules as he believes the ruling would be in the British House of Commons; for he finds the same rule laid down, but more elaborately, in May's Parliamentary Practice.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. May I be permitted to ask a question?

The SPEAKER. There is now no question before the House but the question, Will the House consider the resolution offered yesterday as a question of privilege by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY?]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Would it not be in order, in the Committee of the Whole, for any member of the House to review the speeches made in the Senate in the impeachment case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state a fact with which the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] as one of the older members, is doubtless familiar, that members of each branch do sometimes refer in debate to what has transpired by not locating the scene where it has occurred. During the service of the gentleman from Illinois this has been done quite a number of times, and it has also been done in the Senate when Senators have been checked in debate by the Presiding Officer. But, of course, he does not suggest or recommend any such evasion of the rule.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that the real object of the rule is to prevent—

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BANKS. If there is no question before the House I rise to make a statement in regard to the privileges of members.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was the expectation that some gentlemen on this side should be allowed to controvert any statements of fact made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and they desire to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has withdrawn most of his speech, and the Chair supposed that that desire would not be pressed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to say that some of the statements which the gentleman has made are contrary to my understanding of the facts, and I desire to refer to those matters.

Mr. BANKS. They have been ruled out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has withdrawn them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does he withdraw his whole speech?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes; I withdraw the whole of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is seeking the floor on some matter personal to himself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand, then, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes no personal explanation whatever.

The SPEAKER. He withdraws his speech under the ruling of the Chair. The Chair cannot make the matter any plainer.

WITHDRAWAL FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the rules of the House provide that a member appointed upon two committees may excuse himself from serving upon any other committee at the same time. I was notified yesterday by the Clerk of the House that I had been selected as a member of the committee appointed to investigate some matter appertaining to the transaction of business in the House. I desire that I may be excused from service upon that committee. I would not avail myself of this privilege accorded to a member of the House under these circumstances were it not that a committee of which I am a member has before it for consideration a very important matter which must be disposed of immediately. I refer to the question of the execution of the treaty with Russia. This question was deferred until about the time when the trial upon the impeachment articles commenced, with a view to give members all possible information that could be procured by themselves or by the Government upon that subject. We were, at the time the House suspended business, ready to consider and dispose of the question. During the intervening period we have not had an opportunity to dispose of it. It ought to be acted on without delay, because the honor of the Government is somewhat concerned in the matter. I hope, sir, for this reason I may therefore be excused from serving on the committee appointed yesterday morning.

I am notified that I am a member of some other committee appointed to consider another matter appertaining to the business of the House. Although it is referred to the same committee it is substantially new matter and may be considered a new point. So, if I should accept them all, I would be upon four committees; at any rate a member of three committees beside that to which I was appointed the other day. I hope, therefore, the Speaker will receive the statement I make as a sufficient reason for excusing me from service on this committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct in stating that he is on two committees. One is the Committee on the Rules, a position more honorary than laborious.

Mr. BANKS. I am also on a special committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right, being on two committees, to be excused. The Digest, page 50, states that any member may excuse himself from serving on any committee at the time of his appointment if he is then a member of two other committees. The gentleman is therefore excused.

TENTH ARTICLE OF IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the proposition now before the House?

The SPEAKER. Shall the House consider the resolution, submitted yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY,] as a question of privilege at the present time?

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas this House, in the tenth article of impeachment, charged Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, with a high misdemeanor in office, in that he had made intemperate, inflammatory, and scandalous harangues, which were peculiarly indecent and unbecoming:

Resolved, That in view of the exhibition on this floor on Friday, Saturday, and Monday last, the managers be ordered to withdraw the tenth article from the further consideration of the high court of impeachment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I give notice when that question is disposed of I shall move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 29, nays 106, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Beck, Brooks, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, and Woodward—29.

Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Culom, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Price, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Spaulding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—103.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Dixon, Ela, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jones, Kountz, Maynard, McCullough, Morrissey, Nicholson, Nunn, Paine, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Wood—54.

So the House refused to consider the resolution as a question of privilege at the present time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I agreed to yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. GETZ. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. JENCKES. I hope not.

Mr. GETZ. Is it the understanding that if we go into committee there shall be no further business transacted?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. GETZ. I withdraw my motion for the gentleman from Rhode Island.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that that body had ordered that the Secretary inform the House that the Senate, sitting in the trial of the President of the United States on articles of impeachment, will notify the House when it is ready to receive them again at its bar.

DUELING.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the truth of the report that a duel has been fought in or near the District of Columbia, in pursuance of a challenge or arrangement made within this District, between a person in the diplomatic service of the United States and an attaché of one of the foreign legations, and if they find such an offense has been committed to report to this House whether a due respect for the laws of the United States does not require the House to take measures for the removal from office of the diplomatic officer and for the recall by his own Government of the attaché of the legation; and that for the purpose of this inquiry the said committee are empowered to send for persons and papers.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

DISTRICT COURT IN IOWA.

Mr. DODGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1038) concerning the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, presented the remonstrance of the central committee of South Carolina against the recognition by Congress of the constitution of that State now presented; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

CONDITION OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the General of the Army, covering a report made by General Canby, commanding the second military district, of the condition of that district, together with the views of the General of the Army and of General Canby on the question presented therein; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House has not been in session for so long that I would inquire of the Chair what will be the regular order of business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The first business in the morning hour of to-morrow, if it is a legislative session, will be reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs. After that the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands by the chairman, [Mr. JULIAN,] on which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I would inquire whether now the next regular business will not be proceeded with?

The SPEAKER. It will until some other order is proceeded with in pursuance of a message from the Senate.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is to speak. I would inquire if his speech is on the subject now pending before the Senate.

Mr. SPALDING. Not at all; I do not intend to advert to it. I intend to speak on the finances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gives notice that to-morrow a business session will be expected.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TROWBRIDGE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, a traveler from the Old World, in surveying the magnificent country we inhabit, and in contemplating the recent origin of its Government, the steady growth of its population, the wonderful development of its resources, with the mighty exhibition of its energies, will be led to exclaim:

"'Tis strange—but true; for truth is always strange, Stranger than fiction."

The discovery of America was a great event in the history of the world. As such, it was heralded in by philosophers and poets, with more than the usual precision of prophecy, through the course of nearly nineteen centuries.

Seneca, the moralist, whose birth preceded that of our Saviour but three or four years, and who wrote during the first half century of the Christian era, says, in his "Medea":

"Venient annis secula seris,
Quibus oceanus vincula rorum
Laxet, et ingens pateat tellus,
Tethysque novos detegat orbis;
Nec sit terris ultima Thule."

Of the same tenor, though more strongly marked, was the prediction of Pulci, the Italian poet, who died at Florence in 1487:

"His bark
The daring mariner shall urge far o'er
The western wave, a smooth and level plain,
Albeit the earth is fashioned like a wheel,
Man was, in ancient days, of grosser mold,
And Hereules might blush to learn how far
Beyond the limits he had vainly set
The dullest sea-boat soon shall wing her way.
Men shall descry another hemisphere,
Since to one common center all things tend;
So earth, by curious mystery divine,
Well balanced, hangs amid the starry spheres,
At our antipodes are cities, States,
And thronged empires, ne'er divined of yore.
But see; the sun speeds on his western path
To glad the nations with expected light."

The greatness of this western empire was also foretold by Bishop Berkly in these most beautiful lines, written in 1726:

"The Muse, disgusted at an age and clime
Barren of every glorious theme
In distant lands, now waits a better time, Producing subjects worthy fame."

"Westward the course of empire takes its way,
The first four acts already past;
A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's noblest offspring is the last."

Among the earliest recollections of John Adams is said to have been this couplet, which he was fond of repeating:

"The eastern nations sink, their glory ends,
And empire rises where the sun descends."

In his preface to his "Defense of the Constitution," written in 1787, Mr. Adams says:

"Thirteen governments thus founded on the natural authority of the people alone, without a pretense of miracle or mystery, which are destined to spread over the northern part of that whole quarter of the globe, are a great point gained in favor of the rights of mankind."

Our national domain, exclusive of the purchase from Russia, runs through twenty-five degrees of latitude and fifty-eight degrees of longitude. Its mean length is twenty-four hundred miles, and its mean breadth is thirteen hundred miles. Its area is 2,963,666 square miles. At the breaking out of the war of the Revolution in 1775 the thirteen Colonies contained a population of two million eight hundred and three thousand, of whom five hundred thousand were slaves. The United States has, at this time, a population of forty million souls, all of whom are free. We have endured the extremest test of nations—a civil war, with a cost of life and of treasure that will cause the "wars of the roses" and the "wars of the fronde" to pale on the page of history; but the "star spangled banner" waves in triumph "O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

I am led to these reflections of poets and sages upon the anticipated glory and greatness of our western nation, and also to take a cursory view of its vastness and resources in the hope that a feeling of patriotic pride may be enkindled in our bosoms, and that our most jealous susceptibilities may be aroused whenever and wheresoever the integrity of our glorious governmental system may be placed in jeopardy. It seems but a short time since the Government of our choice was assailed by an open enemy in the field, whose parricidal efforts, countenanced and encouraged by a more dangerous, because more deceitful, enemy in our midst, kept our national energies upon the tension for four long years. We passed through the trying vicissitudes of the most gigantic rebellion the world has ever known, but we did not triumph in the contest of arms without an awful sacrifice. We expended $4,000,000,000 in money and consigned to premature graves two hundred and fifty thousand patriotic young men. Is not this price enough to be paid for stability of government?

But, now, before the wounds of our gallant sons are well cicatrized, the traitors to the Constitution of the United States and the earnest sympathizers with treason are endeavoring to accomplish by the ballot what they could not effect by the bayonet—the overthrow of the supporters of the Union. It may be interesting to inquire for a moment what pretensions the respective political parties of the day make to the confidence of the great body of the people. The great Republican party of the United States has vindicated its claim to loyalty and patriotism by its unswerving devotion to the cause of the Union through a long and bloody war. It acknowledges the supremacy of the General Government for all national purposes, but it upholds with equal tenacity the State government within its peculiar sphere of action, both being limited by the terms of the Federal Constitution.

It claims that the public faith, wheresoever pledged, shall be kept inviolate, and the public credit protected "like the apple of an eye." It favors equal rights in all classes of citizens, and this involves the most extended right of manhood suffrage. It demands ample protection for American products and industry, by the imposition of suitable rates of impost duties. It exacts the full and faithful payment of the national debt, and it wholly repudiates the payment of the rebel debt, as well as the payment of any sum as a compensation for emancipated slaves, or for damage to the property of rebels during the war. It calls for strict economy in the public expenditures, a less onerous system of internal taxation, and a moderate but surely gradual return to "specie payments." The party in the opposition secured for itself an unenviable distinction in the war of the rebellion by retarding the wheels of Government, refusing to vote supplies for our armies, opposing enlistments, and encouraging desertions of our soldiers, making light of our victories, and at all times becoming jubilant at our failures of success; by their open sympathy with and secret aid of the rebels, strengthening their hearts and stimulating them to prolong the contest; in fine, by contributing in every way that combined wickedness and cowardice could devise, to break up and destroy our great and prosperous Republic. This party that has for years insisted that nothing but "quarter-eagles," vulgarly called "mint-drops," should form our currency—this party that adhered so strongly to a metallic currency, in days gone by, as to be styled "the pot-metal party"—this party now demands that the circulating medium of the United States shall be made up of $2,500,000,000 in Treasury notes, and that this trash shall absorb the public bonds and the circulation of the national banks!

I can have some slight respect for the knave who has the courage to openly advocate the repudiation of the national debt; but the miserable craven who poisons the streams of the public prosperity when he dare not obstruct their flow is scarcely entitled to an honest man's contempt. This party stands opposed to equal manhood suffrage, notwithstanding it claims the privilege of being called "Democratic," the very signification of which word, according to our best lexicographer, is "one who favors the extension of the right of suffrage to all classes of men."

And here you are presented with the Democratic creed in two propositions; the one affirmative, the other negative.

1. They favor an unlimited extension of the paper currency.

2. They oppose an extension of the elective franchise.

The appeal of this party to the confidence of the country and to a participation in its offices of honor and trust is only equaled by the request of a pert sexton, recently made to a congregation of free-will Baptists, in the State of Rhode Island. An influential member of their communion had died, and his funeral obsequies were to be celebrated in the most approved style. As the body was being borne into the church, already filled well-nigh to repletion, the sexton deemed it his duty to give to the solemn scene an extra touch. Advancing through the porch, in front of the bearers, he cried with a loud voice, "Ladies and gentlemen, you will please to rise; the corpse wants to come in."

I have said that the political party now and at all times opposed to the patriotic party that adhered to the administration of Abraham Lincoln and carried on the war that saved the Republic proposes to increase the "legal-tender" paper currency to a sufficient extent to pay off the principal of the United States five-twenty bonds as fast as the Government shall have the legal option of making payment, and also to absorb the circulating notes of the national banks. Further, it is claimed by certain visionary theorists that additional railways from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean may and ought to be constructed by means of "legal-tender notes," to be issued by the United States, instead of bonds bearing interest. For purposes of argument it is fair for me to assume that the payment of the five-twenty bonds, the absorption of the bills of the national banks, and the aid to Pacific railroads, would altogether require an issue of $2,500,000,000 in United States "legal-tender" notes, commonly called "greenbacks."

Let it be distinctly borne in mind that by express limitation of Congress no greater amount of United States "legal-tender" notes can now be issued than $450,000,000. The language of the statute is this:

"Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued or to be issued ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loans."—United States Statutes-at-Large, p. 219.

Repeat this highly valuable act of limitation and raise the floodgates of the Treasury for the emission of one thousand or two thousand million dollars in "greenbacks" in addition, and wherein would the United States differ from France in the early part of the eighteenth century, when the whole kingdom was thrown into convulsions by the operation of John Law's system of paying the debts of the nation with the notes of his bank? In 1720 it was forbidden by law that any payment should be made above a hundred livres except in paper. The result was that France was flooded with an irredeemable paper currency to the extent of six thousand millions of livres, or $1,250,000,000. The whole scheme exploded to the infinite distress of the French people, and the grand finale was that the national debt of the kingdom was doubled instead of being diminished.

It is my purpose to show that this cherished plan of paying off the interest-bearing bonds of the Government with United States "legal-tender" notes has no warrant in the Constitution of the United States, in the act of Congress of February 25, 1862, which first authorized their issue, neither is it justified by the plainest principles of political economy or the soundest precepts of common sense.

In the first place, I meet the whole question "without gloves," and affirm that there exists no constitutional power in the Congress of the United States to make paper money a "legal tender" in payment of debts. I admit that under the pressure of extreme necessity, and in order to save the life of the nation, Congress did, in the darkest hours of the rebellion, assume the right to impress on a limited amount of Treasury notes the quality of a "legal tender." And I admit that this extreme measure was justified by the extraordinary circumstances under which it was adopted, and that, under like circumstances, I should not hesitate to repeat the experiment; but I can yield nothing further. A measure of national defense under the weighty pressure of war that brings a strain upon the Constitution of the country is not to be continued, much less extended, as a principle of financial policy in times of peace, without seriously endangering the whole framework of our Government.

The wise men who, in 1787, constructed the great charter of our national rights, had experimental knowledge of the pernicious tendencies of an irredeemable paper currency, for in the year 1780 paper money issued to carry on the war of the Revolution had depreciated to such an extent that in the city of Philadelphia it was sold a hundred dollars in paper for one in silver. Hence it will be found that in framing the Constitution they sought in every possible way to guard against the evils incident to a circulating medium made up of "paper promises."

In article one, section eight, of the Constitution as adopted by the people, we find that the Congress is invested with power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

Referring to volume three of the Madison Papers, pages 1344, 1345, and 1346, we ascertain that when Mr. Rutledge, on the 6th of August, delivered the report of the Committee of Detail, this power "to borrow money" was placed in connection with a power that the Convention utterly refused to grant Congress, to wit, the power "to emit bills on the credit of the United States;" so that the paragraph read in this wise: "The Legislature of the United States shall have power to borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States."

On the 16th of August, 1787, the section being under consideration involving the power to borrow money, &c., Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the words "and emit bills," for the reason, said Mr. Morris, that "if the United States had credit, such bills would be unnecessary; if they had not, they would be unjust and useless."

Mr. Madison inquired "if it would not be sufficient to prohibit the making them a tender."

Mr. Butler remarked that "paper was a legal tender" in no country in Europe. He "was urgent for disarming the Government of such a power."

On the motion for striking out the words "and emit bills" nine States, including Virginia, voted in the affirmative, and but two, New Jersey and Maryland, in the negative.

In a note, at the foot of page 1346, volume three, Madison Papers, are found these significant words:

"This vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper, and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender for either public or private debts."

So the power "to emit bills" on the credit of the United States was refused to Congress, while the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," was expressly conferred by the Constitution.

It is in vain to contend, as some extravagant theorists have done, that this power "to coin money" carries with it the power to stamp paper and convert it into lawful money of the United States.

The lexicographer tells us that the verb "to coin" means "to stamp a metal and convert it into money."

Besides, I have already shown that the Convention that framed the Constitution settled the construction for all time, when they struck out the words, "to emit bills of credit," lest their retention might seem to justify the creation of "paper money" by the national Legislature.

In section ten of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that—

"No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

So that we find among the powers delegated to the Federal Government, "the power to coin money (that is, to imprint upon metals the character of money) and to regulate the value thereof." And among the powers denied to the States this very power "to coin money," so essential an attribute of sovereignty, and the power that was refused to Congress, "to emit bills of credit;" and the further power "to make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

The conclusion of the matter is this: the power to make United States notes or bank bills "a tender in payment of debts" having been denied to the States, and never conferred upon the Government of the United States, remains an undelegated power in the hands of the people by virtue of the tenth article of the amendments of the Constitution:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

The opinions of Daniel Webster upon constitutional powers are commonly received by his countrymen with respect and confidence.

In his speech on "the specie circular," delivered in the Senate of the United States on the 21st of December, 1836, found in the fourth volume of Webster's Works, page 265, he says:

"Currency, in a large and perhaps in a just sense, includes not only gold and silver and bank notes, but bills of exchange also. It may include all that adjusts exchanges and settles balances in the operations of trade and business."

"But if we understand by currency the legal money of the country and that which constitutes a lawful tender for debts and is the statute measure of value, then, undoubtedly, nothing is included but gold and silver."

"Most unquestionably there is no legal tender, and there can be no legal tender in this country under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins at rates regulated by Congress."

"This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain and of the very highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and, although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet, as Congress had no power granted to it in this respect, but to coin money and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power fully in both its branches. It has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value."

The legal tender, therefore, the constitutional standard of value is established, and cannot be overthrown. To overthrow it would shake the whole system."

It was reserved for the Thirty-Seventh Congress of the United States to assert and exert a power, so obviously opposed to the wishes of the framers of the Constitution, to the letter and spirit of the instrument itself, and to its practical construction for three fourths of a century. But it was exerted in the darkest hour of the nation's conflict with treason and rebellion. It was exerted ex necessitate, to save the life of our glorious Republic.

In the nervous language of my honored namesake, [Mr. E. G. Spalding, of New York,] when he introduced from the Committee of Ways and Means the first bill authorizing the issue of "legal-tender" notes, the measure was one of war; said Mr. S.:

"The bill before us is a war measure—a measure of necessity and not of choice—presented by the Committee of Ways and Means to meet the most pressing demands upon the Treasury; to sustain the Army and Navy until they can make a vigorous advance upon the traitors and crush out the rebellion. These are extraordinary times, and extraordinary measures must be resorted to in order to save our Government and preserve our nationality."

Mr. Chairman, I now solemnly aver that if I had been a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress I would have voted, under the pressure of circumstances, for the passage of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862. And I affirm just as solemnly, that at no time since the surrender of Lee's army would I have felt justified in repeating that vote.

One of my fellow citizens in Ohio, Mr. George H. Pendleton, is perhaps the strongest competitor of the honorable member from the Marblehead district in Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] for the distinguished honor of originating the plan of paying Government bonds bearing interest with Government notes bearing no interest; in other words, they both insist that it is lawful and expedient for the Federal Government to pay its five-twenty bonds, bearing an interest of six per cent., at any time after five years from their date, with "greenbacks" or United States legal-tender notes, payable at the pleasure of the Government, and without interest. I can characterize this scheme, which, I am free to admit, has captivated a great many minds, in no better way than as a contemptible and cowardly mode of repudiating the public debt. Let us test it. At the commencement of the present session of Congress the six per cent. five-twenty bonds outstanding against the Government amounted to $1,267,898,100. At the same time the "greenbacks" in circulation throughout the country amounted to $357,164,844.

We will now suppose the five-twenty bonds to be paid by a new issue of "greenbacks" from the Treasury. There will then be in circulation an amount of "greenbacks" equal to $1,625,062,944.

There is, however, a circulation of national bank notes to be taken into consideration, and, although not "legal tenders," they help to swell the volume of paper currency in the United States. The amount, at the time stated, was $299,108,996.

With this sum added, the United States would have a paper currency of $1,924,166,940.

With the present paper circulation of $686,970,478 39, inclusive of fractional notes, prices are sufficiently inflated to place all the luxuries and very many of the necessities of life beyond the reach of the laboring and industrious classes. What would be their condition if this vaunted medium of exchange should be increased $1,237,191,466 61?

The evils would be incalculable. In the language of a distinguished writer on political economy:

"The ills we now feel from an irredeemable paper circulation would be augmented to an insupportable extent. The floodgates of speculation would be thrown wide open. The value of the paper dollar would fall to twenty cents, to ten cents, or perhaps even lower. A financial earthquake, such as has never before been witnessed, or even conceived, would inevitably follow. The very foundations of the social fabric would be upheaved, and, perhaps, overturned. And all public and private indebtedness would finally be extinguished in the general catastrophe."

May a kind Providence, that has hitherto kept "watch and ward" over our beloved country, avert from us such direful consequences! Having shown, as I believe, very conclusively, that the "legal-tender" clause of the act of February 25, 1862, is in contravention of the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, I now proceed to make good my second proposition, to wit: that the act itself does not, either in express terms or by necessary implication, admit of the payment of the five-twenty six per cent. bonds in anything but the constitutional currency of the country, gold and silver. And I shall claim further that my construction of the act at this time is identically the same with that given to it by distinguished members of Congress at the time of its passage, while no one had the assurance then, nor until five years afterward, to claim for it the "Pendleton" construction of the present day.

The first section of the act authorizes the issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes not bearing interest, payable to bearer at the Treasury of the United States in sums not less than five dollars each, which notes are made receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever except interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and also declares that said United States notes shall be lawful money and a "legal tender" in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

Here we have created an anomalous currency of $150,000,000, subsequently extended to $450,000,000, in United States notes, payable to bearer, without interest, and with no fixed time for their payment. Moreover, these United States notes are, by a stretch of power on the part of Congress, about to be thrust into the channels of commerce as "lawful money" and a "legal tender" in payment of debts, as well those already contracted as those to be contracted in futuro. Is there no provision to be made for their ultimate payment? They are for the present a forced loan upon the people. That everybody admits. But will not the Government, in order to insure their circulation at some considerable part of their nominal value, give some assurance that they shall be funded and ultimately paid in the constitutional currency? Most unquestionably these notes will be comparatively worthless without some such provision.

Hence, in the second section of the act, Congress provided that, "to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fund" these notes, he is authorized to issue, on the credit of the United States, coupon bonds or registered bonds to an amount not exceeding $500,000,000, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after five years, and payable twenty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. And the Secretary of the Treasury has power to dispose of said bonds for the United States notes "that may be issued" under the provisions of said act.

Now, the case may be stated in this wise: the Federal Government, under the pressure of a mighty rebellion, placed in the field her gallant armies and upon the waters her heroic navies, but of money she was destitute. Her patriot sons had well-nigh exhausted their coffers in administering to her wants. The banking corporations of the States had loaned most liberally of their pecuniary means, but the demand for supply was continuous and increasing. The soldiers must be fed or constitutional government must fall.

In this emergency the Government manufactures paper money and compels its citizens to take it in payment of debts, at the same time holding out the assurance to the people that every dollar of this extraordinary currency may be absorbed in the funded debt of the United States, drawing interest at six per cent., payable semi-annually "in coin," and the principal sum payable at the pleasure of the Government at any time after five years and within twenty years, as all other public securities are payable when the mode of payment is not otherwise specified, in gold and silver coin. The Congress of 1862 went still further in their enactment, as if to show clearly their intentment.

In section five they provided that all duties on imported goods should be paid in coin, the same to be set apart as a special fund:

1. For the payment of the interest on the bonds of the United States; and

2. For the payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States each fiscal year after July 1, 1862, the same to be set apart as a sinking fund for that purpose.

I do not care to proceed further with this celebrated act of February 25, 1862, except to furnish the contemporaneous construction.

We find the "legal-tender" paper currency created. We find that this currency was to be absorbed by the five-twenty bonds, not the five-twenty bonds by the United States notes. We find that all import duties were to be paid in coin. We find this coin most solemnly pledged for the payment of these same five-twenty bonds, first, the interest semi-annually, as it accrued, and, lastly, the principal, as a part of the "debt of the United States," by means of a sinking fund made up each fiscal year of a part of the coin derived from the customs equal to one per cent. of the entire debt.

When the bill was under consideration in the House of Representatives Mr. PIKE, of Maine, in replying to the objection urged by members in the Opposition that the issuing of United States notes and declaring them a "legal tender" was a violation of the Constitution, said:

"This is no time for the exercise of constitutional pedantry. Let us act boldly and forcibly, and so discharge the high and solemn duty imposed upon us infinitely better than if we shrunk from action under fear of constitutional scruples. Nor need we fear that what we do will be used as a dangerous precedent, for the circumstances which form our justification must be duplicated before our action can be taken as an example for others."

Mr. George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, said: "I doubt whether there is any power in the Federal Government to issue the notes described in this bill, ('greenbacks,') whether they are made a 'legal tender' or not. They are intended to circulate as currency. They come within the definition of 'bills of credit.' I have shown that, if they do come within the definition of 'bills of credit,' the power to emit them was expressly, designedly withheld from Congress."

"But even if I believed this bill to be constitutional in both aspects, I yet see enough in it to merit, as I think, the hearty condemnation of the House. It provides that these notes shall be redeemable only at the pleasure of the United States. They do not bear a single characteristic of a 'demand note.' There is no time when the faith of the Government is pledged to their payment. They will inevitably depreciate. The wit of man has never discovered a means by which paper currency can be kept at par value, except by its speedy, cheap, certain convertibility into gold and silver. Unless convertible, they have always depreciated; they always will depreciate; they ought to depreciate, because they are only valuable as the representatives of gold and silver. You send these notes out into the world stamped with irredeemability. You put on them the mark of Cain, and, like Cain, they will go forth to be vagabonds and fugitives on the earth. It requires no prophet to tell what will be their history."

"The currency will be expanded, prices will be inflated, fixed values will depreciate, incomes will be diminished, the savings of the poor will vanish, the hoardings of the widow will melt away; bonds, mortgages, and notes, everything of fixed value, will lose their value; everything of changeable value will be appreciated; the necessities of life will rise in value; the Government will pay twofold—certainly largely more than it ought—for everything that it goes into the market to buy; gold and silver will be driven out of the country. What then? The day of reckoning must come. Contraction will follow, private ruin and public bankruptcy, either with or without repudiation, will inevitably follow."

This much from the Democratic aspirant for presidential honors when it was only proposed to issue $150,000,000 in "greenbacks." Three hundred and fifty-six millions are now in circulation, with gold in the market at "one hundred and forty," and yet this speculator in political and financial theories urges upon the people the policy of paying off the Government debt with "greenbacks." Verily, the prediction of Mr. Pendleton, made in 1862, may be realized during the first decade after its utterance:

"Private ruin and public bankruptcy, either with or without 'repudiation,' will inevitably follow."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, said:

"It is now proposed in this bill to limit the Secretary to par for six per cent. bonds, the principal and interest to be payable in specie, or its equivalent. It is believed that there can be nothing more secure than these bonds, which thus become, as it were, a standard of value in reference to the currency.

Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, said:

"This bill is a measure of necessity, not of choice. No one would willingly issue paper currency, not redeemable on demand, and make it a 'legal tender.' The daily expenses of the Government are now about two million dollars. To carry us on until the next meeting of Congress will take $600,000,000. The grave question is, how can this large amount be raised? The value of 'legal-tender' notes depends on the amount issued compared with the business of the country. [Here Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, inquired of Mr. STEVENS whether he expected to limit the amount of these notes to $150,000,000, the sum named in the bill.] I expect," said Mr. STEVENS, "that is the maximum amount to be issued."

"Let me restate the various projects. Our's proposes United States notes secured at the end of twenty years to be paid in coin, and the interest raised by taxation semi-annually; such notes to be money and of uniform value throughout the Union. No better investment, in my judgment, can be had; no better currency can be invented. Here, then, in a few words, lies your choice. Throw bonds at six or seven per cent. on the market, between this and December, enough to raise at least six hundred millions, or issue United States notes (greenbacks) not redeemable in coin, but fundable in specie-paying bonds at twenty years."

And now, if it will add force to my proposition that the five-twenty bonds of the United States are, by the pledged faith of the nation, to be finally and fully paid in coin, the principal as well as the interest, I will call in the construction placed upon the loan by the head of the Treasury Department, under whose influence and advice the act of February 25, 1862, was framed and passed.

On the 3d of August, 1863, he wrote to his agents in the city of New York, in reply to an inquiry upon this very subject, made to satisfy persons who proposed to make investments in this class of public securities, as follows:

"All coupons and registered bonds forming a part of the permanent loan of the United States will be redeemed in gold. The five-twenty sixes, being redeemable at any time within twenty years after the lapse of five years, belong to the permanent loan."

His immediate successor, Mr. FESSENDEN, who, as chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate, had been greatly instrumental in procuring the passage of the act, uniformly adhered to this construction of Mr. Chase.

In his last able report on the finances, Mr. Secretary McCulloch uses this language:

"Now, to what is the United States pledged in regard to the public debt? Is it not that it shall be paid according to the understanding between the Government and the subscribers to its loans at the time the subscriptions were solicited and obtained? And can there be any question in regard to the nature of this understanding? Was it not that, while the interest-bearing notes should be converted into bonds, or paid in lawful money, the bonds should be paid, principal as well as interest, in coin?"

"The bonds were negotiated with the definite understanding that they were payable in coin."

If I have not now satisfied all reasonable minds that the five-twenty six per cent. bonds of the United States are payable, both principal and interest, in gold, and that the faith of the nation is pledged to such payment, then I confess my inability to apprehend the force of reasoning.

But I claim that the soundest dictates of public policy are opposed to any further issue of "greenbacks."

On the 1st day of April, 1868, the amount in circulation was $356,144,727. Of fractional currency there was $32,588,689 94, making, of United States currency in paper, $388,733,416 94. At the same time the amount of national bank notes in circulation I assume to be the same with that reported by the Comptroller of the Currency in November last, $299,103,996, making the paper money of the United States, now filling the channels of commerce, $687,837,412 94.

Is this not excessive? In the year 1860 $800,000,000 of coin and bank notes convertible into coin were sufficient for all the legitimate business of the country. But, then, a ten dollar bank note was equivalent to a gold eagle. Now, a "gold eagle" is worth fourteen dollars in greenbacks, while a ten dollar "greenback" is worth in gold but seven dollars and fourteen cents. Then the laboring man, with five or six dollars in his pocket, no matter whether specie or bank notes, could purchase a barrel of flour for his family. Now he must pay in "greenbacks" from twelve to fourteen dollars. And so with almost every article that enters into the family economy. Is not the paper currency sufficiently inflated now? More than five hundred millions of five-twenty six per cent. bonds of the United States are now, at the option of the Government, matured for payment.

It is insisted by Mr. Pendleton and others "of that ilk" that it will be both lawful and expedient to pay off and extinguish this portion of the national indebtedness by a new issue of "greenbacks," thus nearly doubling at one bound the whole paper currency of the United States, making the sum total $1,102,837,412 94. Who is so blind as not to see that in this condition of things the forebodings of George H. Pendleton in 1862 will become fixed facts in the history of the United States?

"Prices will be inflated; fixed values will depreciate;" "the savings of the poor will vanish; the boardings of the widow will melt away;" "private ruin and public bankruptcy will inevitably follow."

How far, let me ask, is this state of things from "repudiation?"

I am fully sensible of the difficulties that environ us as a nation. With unexampled fortitude and heroism the loyal people of the United States carried on the war in support of this popular form of government. That war has cast upon us a great debt which necessarily brings with it heavy taxation. Our people are sometimes restive, but they are nevertheless patriotic; and they "never despair of the Republic." Politicians greatly mistake their temper if they presume that the American people will countenance, much less favor, any scheme for repudiating the public debt or impairing the purity of the public credit.

Our condition requires careful consideration, wise counsel, prudent statesmanship; but it is by no means of a hopeless or even a discouraging character. Our whole national debt may be set down at $2,500,000,000; while the property of the nation in the hands of its citizens is fully $20,000,000,000. The receipts and expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, were as follows:

Total of receipts.....	$490,634,010 27
Total of expenditures.....	346,729,129 33

Of the receipts, there was derived from the customs, in gold, $176,417,810 88. Of the expenditures, there was paid for interest on the public debt, in currency and coin both, $143,781,591 91. In coin alone, $99,760,000. The estimated receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, are $381,000,000. The estimated expenditures, $372,000,000. The appropriations, however, for the next fiscal year will fall considerably below the sum of $300,000,000, and it is confidently expected that by the introduction of a rigid system of economy into all branches of the public service the expenditures may be kept down to about that sum.

The internal taxes have been much reduced and will continue to be diminished until they shall no longer chafe the industrial energies of the people, but will be made to rest mainly upon luxuries and other superfluities.

With the public faith kept bright and unspotted as the sun; with the public debt funded on long time, and at moderate interest, the burdensome taxes removed, the slow but sure return to a specie paying currency kept steadily in view, the loom and the plow put into peaceful and profitable motion, and who can doubt that the United States will be

"Surer to prosper than prosperity
Could have assured us."

Mr. COOK obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TROWBRIDGE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. COOK, (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CHURCHILL: A memorial of J. Benedict & Son, and 29 others, firms and individuals, manufacturers and dealers in lumber, at Albany, New York, in favor of changing the duty on imported lumber from ad valorem to specific.

Also, the petition of Smith, Craig & Co., and others, of West Troy, New York, to the same effect.

By Mr. GROVER: A memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, praying a reduction of the tax on whisky and tobacco.

By Mr. KELSEY: A memorial of 125 citizens of Rochester, New York, praying that a bill be passed by Congress authorizing the construction of a railroad between New York and Washington.

Also, a memorial of citizens of the city of New York, praying Congress to pass a law authorizing the construction of an air-line railroad from New York city to Washington.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 7, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore called the Senate to order, and at once vacated the chair that it might be occupied by the Chief Justice.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned,

The President pro tempore resumed the chair at six o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the Senate adjourned to meet on Monday next at ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 7, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a correction of the Journal. The paper presented yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is referred to in the Journal as the remonstrance of "the central committee of the State of South Carolina." It should read "the Democratic central committee of South Carolina."

THE SPEAKER. It is not so entitled in the papers.

Mr. BECK. It is not so styled in the papers, but that is correct.

THE SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected accordingly.

WAR DEPARTMENT ESTIMATES.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to present some letters from the War Department and some estimates, which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed. It is a matter on which action must be taken very soon, and I desire to have the letters and estimates referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection; and the letters and estimates were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTITUTIONS OF SOUTH CAROLINA, ETC.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five hundred copies each of the constitutions of South Carolina and Arkansas be printed for the use of the House.

COMMITTEE ON FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. LAFLIN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from New York how large a document that will be?

Mr. LAFLIN. It is a very small document; some twenty-five or thirty pages.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to ask the gentleman what the estimated cost of it will be?

Mr. LAFLIN. It may cost two cents a copy.

Mr. CHANLER. Well, it may or it may not. It may cost ten cents a copy.

Mr. LAFLIN. It cannot cost more than two cents a copy, in my opinion, involving an expense of about ten dollars. I wished to put it at the extreme. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

MRS. E. C. BRYANT.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Mrs. Emily C. Bryant and accompanying papers; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, also reported the following resolution; upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House fifteen thousand three hundred copies of the report of J. N. Taylor on the mineral resources of the country east of the Rocky mountains, and that the same be bound with the report of J. Ross Browne, previously ordered.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope this resolution will not be adopted. We print too many of these things.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. These reports were printed together last year, and they ought to be printed together this year.

Mr. LAFLIN. When some days ago our committee introduced a resolution to print a certain number of copies of the report of J. Ross Browne, the House indulged in considerable discussion upon the propriety of printing that report. This report of Mr. Taylor relates to the mineral resources of the country east of the Rocky mountains, and is of the same character with the report of J. Ross Browne, already ordered to be printed. Therefore the committee felt instructed, even though their judgment might not have approved the printing of this report, independently of this report of J. Ross Browne, the committee felt instructed to make the report which has just been submitted. I have no doubt that if the House had it in its power to examine the report of Mr. Taylor and ascertain its character, it would agree with the report of the committee.

Now, if there is any one here who desires to discuss this subject, I will yield the floor, and allow every opportunity for that to be done.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to ask the gentleman if the report of Mr. Taylor would not be too small to make a volume by itself? I understand it will amount to less than a hundred pages.

Mr. LAFLIN. It will make less than one hundred pages; about seventy-five or eighty pages; too small for a volume by itself.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the various votes by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTERING AND RECORDING VESSELS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is resuming the call of committees for reports, under which the Committee on Naval Affairs is entitled to another morning hour. When the last morning hour expired there was pending a bill of the House No. 1023, to amend an act entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels." The previous question was pending, no quorum having voted upon seconding it.

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I will again report it.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

PRINTING OF RECONSTRUCTION DOCUMENTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The House ordered a day or two since the printing of a communication from the President, with the accompanying documents. The Committee on Reconstruction, after examination of those documents, think that it is not worth while to print them all. The committee has selected such portions of those documents as it thinks necessary to have printed. I therefore move that the order of the House be so modified as to cover only such portions as the committee have selected.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] state the objection to printing the whole of the documents?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will state that in the opinion of the committee it is not worth while to print the large bundle of papers which have been referred to it. I think that is the unanimous opinion of the committee.

Mr. BECK. Many of the papers bear upon the expenses of the commissioners, and have nothing to do with the questions we are considering.

The motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH was then agreed to.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) for the protection of American interests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It requests the President to send a sufficient number of vessels of war to the fishing grounds in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, adjacent to the British Provinces, for the purpose of protecting American vessels in the exercise of their rights as recognized under the treaty of 1783, outside of one marine league of the shore line, and as it follows the indentations of the coast; and also for the purpose of taking care that valuable property in shipping shall not be confiscated for alleged infractions of provincial rights in the fishing grounds, and that whatever punishment for trespass is inflicted shall be in proportion to the pecuniary injury occasioned by the offense.

Mr. PIKE. This is a matter of some importance, and I will explain it to the House. This resolution provides that the President shall be requested to send a sufficient fleet to the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence for the purpose of protecting our fishermen. I do not know of how many the usual fleet of fishing vessels consists; but, perhaps, there are as many as a thousand vessels. They are now about sailing for the fishing grounds; and they go there at the mercy of this new dominion. During the time the reciprocity treaty was in force our people had the same right of fishing as the provincial men had. When that treaty was abrogated the provinces, before going into the new dominion, fixed a tax of half a dollar per ton on our fishermen, that tax payable, of course, in gold. Our fishermen paid that tax. The next year the tax was increased to one dollar per ton. Our fishermen paid that. Just now I see it is reported from the Committee on Fisheries of the Parliament at Ottawa that the tax shall be four dollars a ton, and that a sufficient force shall be sent into those waters to collect it. The result will be that our fleet will be driven out of those waters. The question for the House is, whether we shall send our vessels down there to protect American interests in those waters.

The resolution refers to the treaty of 1783 and the convention of 1818. I will read the third article of the treaty of 1783, which recognizes the rights designated in the resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to know whether the President of the United States has not the authority already to send vessels of war there for the protection of these fishing craft?

Mr. PIKE. This does not propose to confer upon the President any authority, but to request him to do it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What is the necessity for requesting him to do it if he already has the authority?

Mr. PIKE. Because it has not heretofore been done, and probably will not be done now without the action of Congress.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Why not direct him to do it instead of requesting him?

Mr. PIKE. Because we lack authority in this branch of the Government to do that.

Article third of the treaty of Paris recognizes certain rights of our fishermen where they had theretofore been accustomed to fish. Under that treaty our men went, as they had before been accustomed to do, into those waters. They continued to do so until the convention of 1818. By the convention of 1818 we, for certain reasons specified in that convention, yielded the right to fish within three miles of certain coasts. The question has arisen, and has been considerably discussed, whether those three miles should run from headland to headland or follow the indentations of the coast. Mr. Webster, and our diplomatists since, have uniformly taken the ground that we should follow the indentations of the coast. This resolution merely adopts the ground which our diplomatists have uniformly taken.

A letter which I hold in my hand, addressed to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] by one of his constituents, indicates the manner in which our men are treated, and I will send it to the Clerk to have it read. It shows more forcibly than anything I can say the necessity for the action proposed in the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

GLOUCESTER, May 1, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I was pleased to see the resolution offered by Mr. PIKE regarding matters in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I have a case in point in regard to seizure, which occurred in 1853, which I will state as briefly as possible. The schooner Florida, Captain Pine, was lying within about three miles of Prince Edward's Island waiting for his boat, which had gone on shore for the purpose of buying potatoes. There were no fish in that place; but the boy, as all boys do, will try to fish. After lying about an hour one of the colonial cutters came along and sent an officer on board and, not without a remonstrance from Captain Pine, took the vessel to Charlottetown. She was there dismantled, the crew turned ashore, and the voyage broken up. By the courtesy of William B. Dean, esq., formerly of Boston, then a resident there, after a lingering suit, we recovered the vessel at a cost of $1,500 in Charlottetown, the loss of all our outfit nearly, the expenses of getting the vessel home, the loss of the season's earnings to owners and crew, in all not less than three thousand dollars. There was no trespass committed and no harm done by the fishermen in this case. It was a gross outrage, and should not be repeated so long as we have a Government to protect us.

Truly yours,

E. W. MERCHANT.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] yield to me a moment, that I may obtain an understanding of this matter?

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand that this is not a joint resolution.

Mr. PIKE. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If it is merely a resolution of the House it would have no binding force or effect whatever. I think, and I believe the House will agree with me, that this is a matter which ought to be very fully considered before we pass upon it. It certainly implies that we shall get into a difficulty which may be a very serious one; for I see that the last part of the resolution provides that "whatever punishment for trespass is inflicted shall be in proportion to the pecuniary injury occasioned by the offense." Who is to be the judge of this? To whom shall this great authority be confided by this resolution of the House? These are questions which I think the House ought to consider very carefully indeed before we shall pass a resolution of this character. It is not a joint resolution; it has not the effect of law, and I myself doubt very much the propriety of passing a resolution of this character without knowing more about the subject and proceeding with more deliberation.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me?

Mr. PIKE. For a question?

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine for information and to make some statement in regard to this matter. If he will only yield to a question I will wait until I can submit some remarks.

Mr. PIKE. My time is limited, and I can only yield for a question.

Mr. CHANLER. My question, perhaps, might cover the ground; but, sir, it is not for the purpose of asking a question I have risen, but to show wherein this matter may be very objectionable. If the House will allow me, without taking it out of the gentleman's time, I would like to make a statement.

Mr. PIKE. I yield for five minutes.

Mr. CHANLER. My objection to this matter arises from two reasons principally. First, that the fishing along the coast of New England has ceased to be, as it formerly was, in the hands of the fishermen alone. It has fallen into the hands of certain monopolists, who, by means of large steam vessels, are absorbing the fishing interests of that region. That is the case round Cape Cod and throughout the country alluded to by the gentleman from Maine. The regular fishermen who have been in the habit of supplying the markets of the great cities by personal labor are now forced to give up the pursuit of their livelihood because they are forced into competition with large and wealthy monopolists. So far for that objection. We are called upon, in other words, to protect a fishing monopoly, organized into granted corporations, instead of American fishermen and the seamen who are furnished to the American Navy by that class. The fishermen are being swept from the coast, and the reason which heretofore existed for the reciprocity treaty has ceased to exist, that is, so far as the fishermen are concerned, as a source of our national strength.

This proposes to put power into the hands of the Executive. The resolution is to give an excuse to the Secretary of the Navy to exercise his power, and then to say to the country that it was the will and wish of Congress that he should involve us in a preliminary process which may bring on a war. The bureau of the Navy Department which may have charge of this matter has acted with the Secretary with great efficiency during the war, but there can be no doubt in the mind of any reflecting man that all connected with that Department have assumed the exercise of unwarranted power.

This is a most important question, in view of the reform inaugurated by the majority of the House in taking away executive power. Here we propose to clothe this Department with extraordinary power, with a capacity, indeed, to involve the country in war. This is the pending proposition.

The question involved is also one of expense. There is no doubt it will accrue to the advantage of those contractors who are now buying, or have already bought up, our iron-clads and other vessels declared by our Navy Department to be useless. If this resolution be passed it will necessitate a larger naval force, and the Government may have to buy them back again. This is the limit in the resolution.

I myself do not desire at this time to undertake to instruct the Secretary of the Navy or the President. They have the power now, and the gentleman from Maine admits this House have already accorded this power. Yet under this resolution the Executive may encourage and protect upon our coast an established and growing monopoly in the fisheries, a business not in the hands of individual fishermen, but held by wealthy corporations, driving the original fishermen, in whose interest the reciprocity treaty was made, from our waters.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly possible to discuss this question in the limit of time allowed me. This resolution proposes simply to send a vessel of war, or more, as may be needed, according to the extent of the fishing ground, to see to it that our fishermen have fair play. It is not a declaration of war. There will be no trouble. The difficulty is this: the colonial authorities by their revenue service seize our vessels; they are taken into port, where there is collusion sometimes between the courts and the captors, and for catching a single mackerel or a single codfish our vessels are condemned. Now, it is only to see that we have fair play done that this resolution is offered. The President does not choose to interfere unless he can have some expression of Congress. This is not outside of any matter of diplomacy. It is in the usual course by which Great Britain and every other nation protect their subjects. They send ships of war to watch their interests. Great Britain has vessels of war stationed in the West Indies, and always has them wherever her commerce goes. It is not a menace; it is not a threat; it is nothing out of the usual course of assertion of national rights, and it is a matter of the highest consequence.

Now, sir, this resolution comes from a committee which has charge of this matter—which has charge of naval affairs. After consideration it has been duly reported. Now, if the House will not take time to discuss the matter fully—and I would like to have it fully discussed—they must follow the report of their committee. We ask for no increased expense; we ask no new vessels to be put in commission; we ask for nothing to be done out of the usual course.

In answer to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] who says this resolution looks to the infliction of punishment, he wholly mistakes it. It only says that where the colonial authorities propose to inflict the punishment of confiscation of a vessel and cargo because of a simple involuntary trespass there shall be a proper interference. I will read that part of the resolution:

And that whatever punishment for trespass is inflicted by the colonial authorities shall be in proportion to the pecuniary injury occasioned by the offense.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would ask what tribunal is to determine this?

Mr. BUTLER. The proper tribunal, before which it shall be brought.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What will that be?

Mr. BUTLER. There will be two. When the vessel is carried in there will be somebody representing the United States there, some naval officer, to see to the matter. But when one of our vessels of war sees a colonial cutter coming up to carry in a vessel for the simple offense of having caught a fish within three miles of the shore, the commander will say, "You cannot take that vessel for confiscation; I will accompany you into port and be responsible for whatever damage or wrong has been done." That is to say, a colonial vessel on the one side undertaking to interfere will be met by a Government vessel on our side which will come in and see to the matter in court instead of having the poor fisherman taken and carried in where he has no redress. It is the usual, ordinary, common protection afforded to commerce by the armed vessels of the nation whose commerce needs protection.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE resumed the floor.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PIKE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire three or four minutes to make a few remarks.

Mr. PIKE. There are other matters which the committee desire to report, and this must be closed up.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Give me three minutes.

Mr. PIKE. Very well.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know whether this is really a joint resolution or a simple resolution of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is really a joint resolution, and has been so treated by the House. It was read twice and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs by the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Maine stated that it was simply a resolution of the House, and in the body of the resolution the word "joint" is stricken out. I only desired to know what it really was.

The SPEAKER. The title is upon the back, and it has been journalized previously as a joint resolution, and read twice.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am unable to persuade myself of the necessity of the passage of this resolution. I am clearly of the opinion that it is inexpedient that we should pass it at this time. What is the state of the case? The President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and of the Navy. It is his duty to see that our commerce upon the ocean is protected, and we have placed at his disposal a large naval force for that purpose. If, then, any necessity exists for sending naval vessels to these fishing banks, the authority is ample in the President to do it. If he refuses to do what the law requires at his hands, if he refuses to perform his duty, let us say by authority of law that the Navy shall be sent there, and not merely by a resolution request the Secretary of the Navy to send vessels there, so that in the event a difficulty grows out of it, he may shield himself behind us, the House of Representatives, by saying that it was upon our recommendation and at our request that this naval force was sent there. I object to it for the reason that we are not attempting to direct him by authority of law. If this is a joint resolution, as it appears to be from the decision of the Speaker, then the word "requested" certainly should be changed to "directed," and we should assume the responsibility and not request of the Secretary of the Navy that he discharge his duty when the law requires it at his hands.

The necessity for sending these vessels to the fishing banks may exist. I am not prepared to say whether it does or does not exist. But the presumption is that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy know better on that subject than we possibly can know, know better than even the Committee on Naval Affairs can know, for I presume they have never attempted to investigate the condition of things up there, or to judge of the actual necessity of sending vessels there. I am opposed to placing this House in the position that the Secretary of the Navy in any event can shield himself behind us in anything that requires a discharge of his duty.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to say that until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] I had supposed it was the duty of the Secretary of the Navy of the United States to protect our commercial interests; I had an idea that it was part and parcel of the duty of our naval establishment, which we keep up at an expense of from twenty to sixty million dollars annually, to protect the mercantile interests of this country; and if the House of Representatives deliberately says that it is not of consequence to protect this large interest, because it may cost a little something to send ships down there, I hope they will follow it with a resolution abolishing the Navy of the United States. I have here figures, which I propose, if time enough is left in the morning hour, to present to the House, which show that we have no commerce abroad, with but trifling exceptions, besides this very respectable fishing fleet, a fleet owned by men of humble means. Three, four, eight, ten, fifteen, or twenty men associate themselves together to fit out a little fishing vessel; they go on board of her—you have taken away all bounties from her—and she goes out there to compete with the provincial fishermen on provincial shores. And the letter I had read to you shows how the provincial authorities treat those fishermen, seizing their vessels, bringing them into Charlotetown without authority of law, and, after a lingering suit, costing $1,500, releasing the vessel as seized without authority of law. And then, at a cost of $3,000 and the entire breaking up of the voyage, these humble, poor men get their vessel back again. Where is their redress? This was something that happened years ago. But it has been duplicated, and duplicated in fifty and a hundred instances, before the passage of the reciprocity treaty. From the convention of 1818 until the reciprocity treaty of 1854 there were several hundreds of these vessels seized. They were carried before the provincial authorities, where they were tried, and but one in ten was condemned. And in the instance to which I have referred the trifling offense was that while the vessel lay in the harbor, having sent her boat ashore for provisions and water, a boy threw a line overboard, but caught no fish. That was the whole offense—that a boy threw a line overboard without authority of anybody on board the vessel. A provincial vessel seized that vessel, carried her into Charlotetown, tried her, and she was rescued by her poor owners at an expense of $1,500. They got her back at a cost to themselves of $3,000. And there is no redress on the part of this great Government. Yet now, when we propose to send one or two of our vessels of war to protect our fishing interests—vessels for which we have no use to protect our commerce in other parts of the world, because it has been swept from the ocean by our laws—when we propose this, it is objected to. A small fisherman cannot fight the Government of Great Britain; a small fisherman cannot protect his rights, and the American Government should do it. War? Who is afraid of war? This resolution asks nothing but that your own laws shall be enforced. Are you afraid to enforce them? If you are, then I hope you will vote down the resolution. I call the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PIKE. For a question.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask five minutes if the gentleman has time.

Mr. PIKE. I have not the time.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask consent to say a few words. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this matter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PIKE. I do not wish to press this matter without discussion; yet we have but little time for the Naval Committee, and they have other matters of importance before them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman from Maine think it fair, with but a few minutes' discussion, to pass a resolution through this House which involves the construction of treaties, and perhaps may involve the country in war, to do this with but half an hour's consideration?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PIKE. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] for a question.

Mr. CHANLER. My object is to reply to the gentleman—

Mr. PIKE. I cannot yield for anything but a question.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman asked a question, and I want to answer it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Has this matter been considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. PIKE. It has not.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. This resolution undoubtedly involves our foreign relations. I think it is a subject of sufficient importance to be considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PIKE. Which is to kill it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why so?

Mr. PIKE. Because the Committee on Foreign Affairs cannot report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why not?

Mr. PIKE. Because it cannot be reached for a long time, as the committee have other matters in their hands to be reported upon—matters of such importance that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] on yesterday felt obliged to withdraw his attention from all other committees. And this fishing fleet is just about being fitted out, and this protection is needed just at this juncture.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. How long has this wrong existed? How many years have our fishermen been so wronged? Yet the gentleman asks us to act upon the subject in five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. I will reply to the gentleman, and I wish the House to understand the reply. The reciprocity treaty was repealed in 1865. The provinces imposed a duty upon these fishing vessels of half a dollar per ton, which they paid. Then the next year they imposed a duty of one dollar per ton, which they paid. At the present time the Government at Ottawa is passing a bill, if the bill has not already passed, imposing a duty of four dollars per ton upon those vessels, (which they cannot pay,) and this is accompanied with a provision for sending sufficient force down there to enforce that tax upon our fishermen.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. When did the case to which the gentleman has referred occur?

Mr. PIKE. Before the reciprocity treaty. The reciprocity treaty gave us free rights of fishing for eleven years. And there were similar cases occurring before that treaty, cases of injustice, in which there was no redress. Now, the question for the House to determine (and I do not propose to argue it further) is whether within the treaty (for the resolution adopts no construction of a treaty except that which has already been maintained by our Government, and is maintained there to-day) whether within that treaty—

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to inquire when it was that we passed a resolution similar to this. It was about a year ago, was it not?

Mr. PIKE. About a year ago.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman would not be willing to dispense with the latter part of the resolution, so as to provide simply that one or more vessels shall be sent out to look after our fishing interests. Would not such a provision answer the purpose?

Mr. PIKE. If that will satisfy the House I shall not object to it.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the House will let the bill go through in that form.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SPALDING. Oh, no; let us pass it.

Mr. PIKE. The Committee on Foreign Affairs knows nothing more about this question, and will know nothing more about it after investigation, than the House knows to-day. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio proposes to move that amendment, I will permit it to be offered, and then I will call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the concluding words, as follows: "recognized in the treaty of 1783, outside one marine league of the shore line as it follows the indentations of the coast, and also for the purpose of taking care that valuable property in shipping shall not be confiscated for alleged infraction of provincial rights in the fishing grounds, and that whatever punishment for trespass is inflicted shall be in proportion to the pecuniary injury occasioned by the offense;" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "indicated in subsisting treaties."

Mr. PIKE. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. There are two undebatable propositions now pending—the call for the previous question and the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CHANLER. The amendment which I desire to offer is to provide that an additional fleet be sent by the President to the coast of Ireland to protect American citizens trading with Great Britain. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] whether he will accept this amendment?

Mr. SPALDING. I must decline to accept it as an amendment to my proposition.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope I shall have an opportunity to offer it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, is there any motion pending to refer this subject to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. There is not. That motion would not be in order during the pendency of the call for the previous question and the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. When will that motion be in order?

The SPEAKER. If the House should vote down both the pending propositions it would be in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] withdraw the call for the previous question to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to move to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. PIKE. I do not.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 51, noes 34; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. PIKE and CHANLER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be now put.

The SPEAKER stated that the question first recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the joint resolution and amendment be laid on the table; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 76, not voting 62; as follows:

Mr. PIKE. I rise now to close debate under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to an hour.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Maine to yield to me for a moment. I have a bill which I am instructed to report from the Committee on Reconstruction, and I wish to report it for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted.

Mr. PIKE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MUGEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to report from the Committee on Reconstruction at any time, and the gentleman from Maine has yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

PROTECTION OF FISHING VESSELS—AGAIN.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the Navy appropriation bill, some days ago, in the Senate, it was said that we needed an increase of the Navy because of our increased commerce. I have no doubt that the gentleman who made that statement believed in its accuracy. Gentlemen familiar with the statistics of this country know that our population has increased with immense rapidity, varying little in percentage from decade to decade, running up each ten years more than one third in amount of the preceding ten years. The increase of general property in the country is very much more in proportion than the increase of our population, and our manufacturing interests everywhere, under the protection of wholesome laws, have been constantly springing up, using our numerous water powers throughout the land, and adding to their force the illimitable power of steam. Agriculture has pushed its energies into every locality and given duplicate and triplicate receipts year by year. Gentlemen familiar with the statistics of these great industries naturally supposed that commerce, the handmaid of agriculture, enriching both, has participated in the general prosperity. I wish it were so. But unfortunately it is far from being the case.

I have taken some pains to examine the statistics of the tonnage of this country as compared with that of Europe, and I will briefly submit the facts I have gathered to the House. I shall make but very few comments upon them; they speak in language much stronger than any that I can use. I hold in my hand a table exhibiting the tonnage owned by the United States and Great Britain at different periods. I have made it from the year 1810 up to the last published statement in 1867:

Tonnage owned by the United States and Great Britain at different periods.

	United States.	Great Britain.
1810.....	1,424,748	2,426,044
1820.....	1,280,167	2,648,593
1830.....	1,191,776	2,531,819

1861.....	5,529,813	5,895,369
1862.....	5,112,105	6,041,358
1863.....	5,125,081	6,629,403
1864.....	4,986,401	7,103,261
1865.....	5,096,781	7,322,604
1866.....	4,310,778	7,297,984
1867.....	4,256,017	no returns.

It will be seen that for a long period we kept along with unequal steps with our great rival, annually increasing our proportion until the year previous to the war, 1860, when our tonnage nearly equaled that of Great Britain, and, as matters were then running, in a few years we should have reached and outstripped that country. The aggregate tonnage of these two great commercial nations in 1860 was eleven million sixty-four thousand eight hundred and thirty-six tons, divided about equally. At the last report for the year 1866 the aggregate tonnage of the two countries was about the same, but of it we owned four million three hundred and ten thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight tons and Great Britain seven million two hundred and ninety-seven thousand nine hundred and eighty-four tons.

Although we have a statistical bureau with a large force and amply paid, our statistics are exceedingly imperfect. They do not exhibit how much of this tonnage is engaged in the home trade and how much in the foreign trade, what proportion is in canal boats, what proportion is in river steamboats, and what proportion is in sea-going vessels. In these particulars our statistics are defective—much more so than those of Great Britain.

We changed our system of tonnage four years ago, and it is found on examination that we are carrying along the old balance, so that the four million two hundred and fifty-six thousand and seventeen tons includes an old balance of about three hundred thousand tons which exist nowhere except on paper. The result is, making the proper allowances, Great Britain to-day owns more than two tons to our one.

In addition to the statement I have made is the fact that our tonnage includes the whole of our immense canal-boat tonnage, and all the tonnage in the interior waters, while in Great Britain they have no corresponding figures; for the whole length of the canals of Great Britain is but about four thousand miles, and the whole tonnage in the "home trade" of that country at the last report is but nine hundred and sixty-one thousand one hundred and three tons, while our whole tonnage with but trifling exceptions, is engaged in the home trade. They have no inland commerce as compared with ours; and our canal tonnage with its six thousand miles of canals, of course greatly exceeds theirs. Then, in addition to that, we have an immense river commerce, of which Great Britain has but a trifling amount. So, then, this table shows the fact that whereas in the year before the war we had nearly overtaken Great Britain, and according to the rate of progress we were making, in a short time we should have passed her, to-day we have less than half the tonnage that Great Britain owns, and most of that is made up of canal, river, and lake boats, and coastwise tonnage.

I now give another table, which exhibits the exports and imports of the three great commercial nations of the world, England, France, and the United States. I exhibit this table for the purpose of showing the immense increase of exports and imports of these great countries:

Exports and imports of England, France, and the United States.

	England.	France.	United States.
1833.....	$427,500,000	no returns.	$198,235,000

1855.....	1,301,170,000	865,380,000	536,538,000
1860.....	1,875,260,000	1,160,960,000	762,355,000

1866.....	no returns.	no returns.	996,196,000

In this table the pound sterling is reckoned at five dollars, and the result given in round numbers.

This table shows the work there is for tonnage to do. The increase of business is not based upon population, for the population of these countries has increased but moderately between these dates; but rather based upon the increase of wealth, and that is in almost arithmetical proportion to the increase of railroads in the several countries.

Now, I come to table No. 3, which is a very interesting table to every American citizen. It is a table exhibiting the Baltic and North sea trade with the United States. It gives our exports to them and our imports from them in American and foreign vessels:

I can give no later than 1866, because that is the latest published returns, and although I have applied for them, I have been unable to obtain later returns from the Bureau of Statistics. It is believed that the later returns are still worse.

I turn now to table No. 4, exhibiting the trade of the European Atlantic ports:

I believe the present exhibit would be still worse than that here given, and that now the imports from Europe to New York are nine dollars in foreign vessels to one dollar in American vessels, whereas forty years ago we had nine dollars in American vessels to one dollar in foreign vessels.

I now turn to the Mediterranean trade—the trade "up the Straits," as sailors call it—where we formerly had a class of small vessels of from two to three hundred tons engaged in the fruit trade, just as fine specimens of naval architecture as ever floated on the waters of the ocean. Let me show you the statistics of that trade to-day:

Those are the three great European trades—a trade now done to some extent in steam. Formerly the Baltic and North Sea trade was against us, because in the Baltic, with their cheap timber and labor, they built vessels as cheaply, or cheaper, than we could do. But the trade of the European Atlantic ports and the Mediterranean trade was in our hands, and now, as you see, it is in the hands of Great Britain.

Let us go further. Here is the East India trade—a trade done exclusively then and now in sail vessels. It is a trade calling for a large amount of tonnage, because it takes vessels nearly two years to make a voyage:

EAST INDIA TRADE.

The trade was nearly all formerly in our hands, and now two thirds of it is in British!

Mr. Speaker, let us come a little nearer home. Here is the West India trade—a trade right here, almost within sound of my voice, a trade that we had the whole of, a trade that is as much ours as the coasting trade, if your laws would permit us to do it:

And this winter I understand the sugars from Havana to New York were brought chiefly in British vessels.

Ay! without regard to race or color, the little island of Hayti, with whom we have diplomatic intercourse, sends her sugar and dye stuffs to us in British bottoms, and we send out to her the products of our great West in British vessels.

Here, again, is the South American trade—a trade that was ours, and one which one would think we had a continental interest in retaining:

Before the war eleven to one in our favor, and now nearly three to one against us!

So all the great trades of the world are being done by Liverpool and London. They come across the Atlantic, and go to the West Indies, to Mexico, Guatemala, to Rio, around the Horn and up to Valparaiso, bringing the hides and iron and copper and everything else produced by South America away in British bottoms to American ports. And not only that, but they carry away in British bottoms the great annual products of this country, and distribute them among the South American countries.

I said that the figures speak stronger than any language I can use as to the present character of these great trades. I now submit to you that this is a matter not of interest to the coast merely, but to the whole country. Why, sir, the great West wants cheap transportation as much as the sea-board wants to afford it. There is no portion of the remotest State in the West which produces wheat for the market which does not find the price of its products at home measured by the price at Liverpool. And the price in Liverpool is composed of the cost of production, the price of transportation to the sea-board, and the price of transportation across the Atlantic to the market in Europe. And the cost of transportation bears a very large proportion to the cost of the article at the place of sale.

Now, the effect of the present condition of things is, that you exclude from this carrying trade all American competition. You will not allow us to come in and compete for this carrying trade. You say practically to our ship-owners, "Hands off! We want British vessels to come over here and carry these products, and we do not want any American competition in the business!"

I submit to you, sir, that if you will allow the ship-builders and the ship-owners to come in on fair terms they will compete for this transportation and will cheapen it. It cannot be otherwise. It is but a monopoly now, a monopoly made by our laws, in the hands of European merchants and European ship-owners. They have come over here; they have established themselves in New York. To-day the importing merchants of New York are foreigners. They have no interest whatever in your Government; they have no interest in the prosperity of your country. They import these goods and sell them to you. They export the goods you wish to export, and do it in vessels of their own nationality; and when they have accumulated their fortunes they will retire and enjoy them in the countries of their birth. Certainly, in that aspect of the case, this is a matter of national importance, of interest to all sections of this country, and it cannot by any logic or statesmanship be confined to the coast.

Another thought of importance is this: that this freight or cost of transportation is an important matter in making up the balance of trade. Formerly, when this carrying trade was in our hands, we had the outward freight and the return freight. When we sent abroad our products we not only got pay for the products themselves, but we were also paid for the freight upon them. But now, when we import silks, or iron, or cotton, or woolen, or other goods—as we do now to the extent of $300,000,000 annually, yes, in one year to the extent of $500,000,000—we not only pay that $500,000,000, but the freight on it, which is a very large percentage of the cost, and it all goes abroad together, and the whole sum is necessarily in gold; so that we are sending our gold abroad to pay for the freight on the goods we import; and the freight on the goods we export also goes abroad, and it forms a very large item in making up the balance of trade.

There is another consideration of very considerable importance in an economical point of view. There is in this country but little need for a navy in time of peace if you can so encourage our ship-yards that they can extemporize a navy in time of war. How is it now with us? The ship-yards capable of producing large vessels have gone to decay; the men are discharged and engaged in other pursuits. In the matter of producing vessels, either in the navy-yards or the commercial ship-yards of the country, we have nothing on this continent to compare with Europe. It is easy for us to boast—and we are accustomed to do it—about our Navy and our facilities for building ships; but what are the facts? Why, sir, the Millwall Dockyard Company on the Thames, in the neighborhood of London, a mere private enterprise, is capable to-day of producing more ships than any navy-yard in this country. It is so complete an establishment that it can take in the pig iron and the bar iron and out of them produce an iron-clad ship of war, every part and parcel of her, including, I think, even her armament. That establishment, with its erections, occupies fifteen acres, and it is rivaled by other establishments producing such immense ships as the Great Eastern, of twenty-three thousand tons burden, and those great iron-clad steamships of the British navy.

Such are the vessels produced in the private dockyards of England. Then there is Laird's great establishment at Birkenhead, where have been produced the Alabama and several of the large steamships of war now in the British navy. Then, again, the Clyde steamers are famous the world over. We have them plying to and from almost every seaport on the Atlantic coast. We have not only given up producing steamships in this country, but we hail with joy the enterprise of a foreigner if he will but introduce a steamship line anywhere upon this coast. The large city of Baltimore, with two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, celebrated in former days for its tonnage, producing that remarkable specimen of naval architecture formerly known as the Baltimore clipper, has to-day not only given up its efforts at foreign commerce, but celebrated a gala day a short time since, the day on which a Clyde steamer arrived in the harbor, as a precursor of a line established there to do the business of importing and exporting such goods as Baltimore might desire to buy or to send abroad. The citizens turned out in the street and welcomed the first arrival of steamers that the enterprising Liverpool firm had concluded to send to that imbecile port. They were as glad as Hong Kong might be at the arrival of the Pacific mail steamers first ship! That is the condition to which the great city of Baltimore is reduced to-day; and it is but a specimen of the position of the other cities of this continent. From the port of New York there sails on an average one sea-going steamship every day, built in Europe, and no one of them flies at her masthead the stars and stripes as her national emblem. The last of our American line, the Fulton and the Arago, were sold at auction the other day in New York, to be hustled off and broken up as old iron. In the place of those vessels we have from foreign ship yards magnificent specimens of naval architecture sailing every day into and out of the port of New York, plying between that city and Liverpool, Queenstown, Southampton, Havre; and other European ports, every one of them under a foreign flag; and when any of our gentlemen tourists go abroad for pleasure, as many thousands of them do annually, they go under the foreign flag of course!

Well, sir, this was not so formerly. It should not be so now. Let me tell you what the Congress of the United States did at its very first session—that famous Congress which, as was claimed in the Senate, settled the question of the division of powers in this great Government. The very first public act of that Congress was an act embracing the protection of our shipping. Act No. 1 on our statute-book relates simply to oaths of officers. Act No. 2 is a tariff act, and, among other things, protects American shipping.

The act of August 10, 1790, provided that the tariff on all articles imported in American vessels shall be less than if imported in foreign vessels. The great East India trade that I have spoken of we determined to have in our hands. It was provided that the tax upon tea in American vessels should be six cents per pound, and in foreign vessels fifteen cents per pound. That was on Bohea tea. On other teas it was still more. On Hyson it was twenty cents per pound in American vessels, and forty-five cents in foreign vessels, making a protection of twenty-five cents per pound on tea in favor of American shipping.

On all other goods from China and India twelve and a half per cent. was afforded to American vessels in the way of protection; and on other articles from other countries there was a protection of five, seven and a half, ten, and fifteen per cent. in our favor, discriminating in the articles and the ports from which they came.

Mr. Speaker, that is the way we began in this Government, and as a consequence we raised our tonnage from two hundred thousand tons up, in the first twenty years of our existence, over one million four hundred thousand tons. After we began to get a respectable tonnage we commenced to discriminate with Great Britain and there was a war of statutes. We have upon our statute-books laws in favor of the various trades of the country. We determined to have those trades, the West India trade, the colonial trade, and the trade with Great Britain. During one period the statutes were so severe that we could not enter Nova Scotia to bring out merchandise from there, and we would not allow Nova Scotians to come in and take our articles. We could not import at all from Nova Scotia, and vessels in my neighborhood were obliged to meet on the line and clandestinely transfer the cargo from one vessel to the other. Such was the protection that Congress afforded in the early days to our shipping interest.

Now, sir, they did more than that. The very third act of Congress was an act expressly for the protection of our shipping and nothing else. The law of July 20, 1790, declared that on American vessels the tonnage tax should be six cents per ton and on foreign vessels the tonnage tax should be fifty cents per ton, making a very material difference.

This tonnage tax, after a series of years, was finally abolished, and we were free of it up to the time of our late war. At the time of our war we had a tax put upon our tonnage of ten cents.

A MEMBER. By what acts?

Mr. PIKE. By the act of 14th July, 1862, a tonnage duty of ten cents per ton, which was subsequently increased to thirty cents, and to-day it stands as an anomaly upon the statute-books of the country that you tax your own shipping interest at the rate of thirty cents per ton.

I ask you to consider for a moment how this tax upon our tonnage bears upon the shipping interests of the country. I have a letter from a constituent of mine, living in one of the small towns where the people get a living by going to sea, in which he says that in his town forty vessels are owned, only two of which are fit to stand the inclement seas of winter and the others have to lay up in that season, being able only to go to sea in the pleasant summer months of the year. They follow the coasting trade, and participate in it for about six months of the year. They are taxed thirty cents per ton. He tells me that amount is in many instances three per cent. annually on a market valuation!

When I proposed to tax the property in our national bonds one per cent. annually. I was listened to by some who heard me with a kind of holy horror! The modest tax of one per cent. was called repudiation, but to tax poor humble men in my district three per cent. annually of the gross value of their property is all right!

That is the way in which Congress now protects the commerce and the shipping interests of this country. That is the way in which you tax the property of poor men who are dependent upon it for their livelihood. That is the way you tax them, while you relieve cotton from tax, and when you relieve the rich manufacturers of the country from $80,000,000 of tax; while you do this for the rich manufacturers, you impose heavy taxes upon the humble men who bear your flag upon the high seas as far as they are able to go.

-And now I come to the reasons for the decline in our shipping. It is very easy to say that it has been occasioned by the war. The war stimulated our manufactures.

Mr. MYERS. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not know that I disagree with him in what he has said, but I do not like one of his arguments. Does he mean to tell this House and the country that the relief we have given from taxation is simply to certain rich manufacturers, and not to the laborers whom they employ throughout the whole country? If not why does he use such an unnecessary argument here in behalf of a just bill?

Mr. PIKE. I made a statement that cannot be contradicted, that we relieved from taxation the rich manufacturers of the country. It cannot be denied that we have failed to relieve the humble interests of the country that I have described. I know the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.] It is familiar to me from my boyhood. It is that the incidental benefits that accrue to the manufacturer reach the employé. I have used that kind of argument ever since I learned to talk in public. I was a protectionist in my day, and I argued that in protecting the manufacturer we protected the employés; that manufacturing establishments would draw around them operatives who would receive the drizzle of protection that filtered through their employers. I am not so thoroughly imbued with the justice of that idea as I used to be.

I have come to the conclusion that the laws of the country need some reforming in this respect, and instead of going for a higher tariff I regard it as the interest of this country, all parts of it, that there should be a reasonable tariff, founded on reasonable principles.

Mr. PILE. With the permission of the gentleman from Maine, I desire to say that we at the West always entertained the doctrine which I understand him now to maintain on the subject of the tariff.

Mr. PIKE. I return to the question of the reason for the decline of American shipping. It has been the custom to say with great flippancy that American shipping has declined only because of the war. But, sir, the war quickened all the industrial interests of this country. It quickened manufactures, agriculture, and trade. Why did it injure commerce? Foreign pirates were let loose to prey upon our commerce. They seized our unprotected merchantmen on the ocean and confiscated them. The result was that few of our vessels would sail on the ocean for fear of being taken by pirates, and few sea-going vessels were built.

This was a serious loss. While benefiting the other great industries of the country it was hard that those who engaged in commerce should be almost the only sufferers pecuniarily by the war. But great as it was it ended with the war. We lost some six or seven hundred thousand tons destroyed or sold abroad. We can easily replace it. Our ship-builders can replace it in a single year if you by your congressional laws will permit them to do it.

Steam is another reason given. It is said that the commerce of the world is changing into steam, and that consequently sail vessels do not bear the proportion and do the business that they did formerly. How is that? Why, of the whole tonnage of Great Britain, of the whole seven millions of tons they have but little rising half a million tons of steam tonnage. Of the great trades I have enumerated but one, the European-Atlantic trade, is done with steam. The great East India trade, the West India trade, the South American trade, the North Baltic trade, and the Mediterranean trade is done to-day, as it has always been done, with sail vessels. The only difference is that those sail vessels are owned in Liverpool instead of in this country, and carry at their masts-head the cross of St. George instead of the stars and stripes.

There is another reason, and that is your tariff. Under the operation of your tariff as it is enforced to-day it costs two dollars to build a vessel in an American port for every dollar which it costs in an English port. It costs $100,000 to set afloat a ship of one thousand tons built in New York, and $50,000 to set her afloat in St. John. Then, sir, there is another reason. This matter of tonnage is evanescent. The life of a vessel is but ten years on the average, and if we stop building for ten years our tonnage will run out. You must renew ten per cent. every year if you would keep your stock good. If Great Britain does not build seven hundred thousand tons a year she loses tonnage. If we, with our little tonnage, do not continue to build three hundred and fifty thousand tons a year we decline. We must build year by year or else shipwrecks and wear and tear will drive our vessels from the ocean.

Well, now, there is a way, and but one way, by which these two ideas of a protective tariff and a prosperous shipping interest may be reconciled. Continue to protect your manufactures; I have constantly voted for them; but give to your shipping the protection that Great Britain, under her protective policy, always gave to her shipping. The subtle idea of protection underlying British laws was to import the raw material free. And to-day, in Great Britain, not one dollar is paid on the material used in the construction of vessels, and never has been, and in that way they have grown up a tonnage of seven millions.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] a question, and that is, that I hope the House is not to understand from his remarks that he is advocating "free trade." I should regret if my friend should go over to that party and advocate a system that is detrimental to American interest.

Mr. PIKE. I hope I have stated my position so clearly that there is no misunderstanding it. I constantly vote for tariffs—I do not advocate free trade—but we must have the articles that enter into ship-building free of duty or we cannot build ships. If it is an object to have ships built in this country you must allow the ship-builders to have their materials free of duty.

This is no new principle on our statute-book. We have had drawbacks ever since we had tariffs. Whenever we have exported an article of American manufacture where there was an American tax on it we have had a drawback on that article, as to-day we have upon the article of whisky and all the various articles covered by our internal tax law. Now, a ship is constantly exported, and on that principle is entitled to drawback. She goes abroad in competition with foreign vessels. She gets the same freights as Liverpool vessels, pays the same tonnage dues, the same port charges and insurance, and is in every way on a par with her.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the policy I propose costs the Government nothing; it costs the manufacturing interests nothing. If this policy is not adopted we cannot build vessels, and consequently manufacturers cannot sell their articles to us. If you adopt this idea—which is the idea that prevails in other countries—then we can build vessels, then you can establish branches of trade, and in this way indirectly we shall assist manufacturers.

But, sir, further, in Canada, the very first thing done when the Parliament of the New Dominion came together—governing just about the same number of inhabitants that this Congress governed in 1790—the very first thing it did was to enter upon a career of protection to ship-building. It provided that every article entering into the construction of vessels, and every article used on board a vessel, should be free of duty. Under that law, in two decades, if not in one, that little Government of three million people will outstrip this great Government of forty millions upon the high seas if we continue acting under our present laws.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand him to be talking very much like a Western man this morning.

Mr. PIKE. I do not want any comments upon my speech now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. PIKE. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If free trade is good for the people of New England, who are engaged in building ships, why is it not good for the laboring masses of the West in procuring the necessities of life, those articles upon which they live, with which they clothe themselves, &c.?

Mr. PIKE. I do not propose to go into a discussion of the tariff now; I have not the time for it. When he asks for a drawback on western productions shipped abroad I shall assist him.

Let me resume my argument. The remedy for the state of things I have described will not be found in purchasing vessels. This country cannot stand, any more than any other commercial country, the free importation of vessels, and for the reason that your merchants do not own your ships. The men who build the ships, who create them, are they who own them. If you import ships free of duty you can import them only through the means of capitalists. If you create them it will be by the labor of your own citizens. My district is by no means wealthy, but it has been for a long time the largest ship-owning district in the country, because it is a ship-building district.

Now, we are no exception, in this respect, to the whole line of history. Commercial powers have arisen and fallen ever since the Phœnicians were the leading commercial Power of the globe, and every nation that could build ships better than other nations has, in its turn, been the leading commercial Power of the world. We know that the Phœnicians built their own ships, getting their wood from Mount Libanus, and it was because they could build them that they so long maintained their commercial supremacy. Venice, on the shores of Italy, built her own ships. Carthage did the same; Portugal and Spain took up the scepter in their turn; then the Dutchman came in, building vessels cheaper than any other country, and created a mercantile navy that, in the day their proud Admiral Van Tromp, expressed its strength by the emblem of a broom at the mast-head, to sweep from the sea all opposition.

We know that that supremacy was transferred from the Dutch to the English, and there, with varying fortunes, it remains until this day, so far predominating that no nation in the world approximates to them. And although for a time there was a formidable rival here upon the American continent, yet now, in the very meridian of our strength, we give up the contest. After ninety years, and with a population of forty millions, we have culminated and grown old as to this branch of power, and no longer contest for the supremacy of the sea.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. PIKE. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to inquire whether history does not prove that every nation, from Phœnicia down through the Hanseatic League to England, has not arisen by means of commercial supremacy and dependence upon trade, but rather from the development of agriculture and the material resources of the country, and its decline has dated from the establishment of its commercial ascendancy?

Mr. PIKE. Nations rise and fall, and there have been various reasons for it. I would commend the gentleman to the work of that learned historian, Gibbon, who has set forth at some length the reason for the decline and fall of the Roman empire. [Laughter.]

My argument was this: that in the meridian of our power, while with a strong arm we were striking out to the right and the left, while we were leading the nations of the world in agriculture and manufactures, and all the processes of civil life—ay, in military life, if we were called upon to try it—at this time we have begun to grow old, are willing to surrender all effort to obtain the control of the seas, and are willing to rest simply upon our national boast that when the time comes we can extemporize a Navy and build up a commerce.

I have shown by these tables that the British Government, through the subtle effect of wise laws, has been stealing away from us our wealth upon the seas.

Why, sir, I have here in my hand a letter sent to me by a sea captain in my district. He says:

"I have just received a letter from my London correspondent, dated December 30. It writes me: 'The prospect looks fair for British ship-owners. As long as your absurd navigation laws last we are not likely to have much competition from your flag.'"

That is the comment of a London ship-owner. I might go still further, and exhibit, in detail, the reasons I have but indicated generally. As to the matter of the tariff, I say there is no conflict between the tariff on the one side and commerce on the other if we will but act reasonably. With a wise administration of our laws we may cultivate our domestic interests, and our manufactures and commerce may go along hand in hand, pari passu; for commerce is the handmaid of manufactures and agriculture.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE. I hope that, by unanimous consent my colleague [Mr. Pike] will be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. PIKE. I thank the House for its courtesy, and shall say but a word more.

I was remarking, Mr. Speaker, that commerce is the handmaid of manufactures and agriculture. France is and has been for a series of years a great manufacturing country. The exports and imports of France are nearly $1,500,000,000. We annually send to that country large sums for the very excellent manufactures which we cannot as yet produce here. But France is not a commercial country. She never has been and she never will be, because she cannot build ships to compete with England or with us. We are come to be a great manufacturing country because our laws protect manufactures. We are a great agricultural country by force of our position, our climate, the fertility of our land. Thus we supply the material for the largest commerce that ever existed in the world. There is no need of sacrificing one dollar of the interests of either manufactures or agriculture, because without the great productions of manufactures and agriculture we have no business for ships. With them, if you will but allow us, we will furnish the vessels, we will create the commerce upon the seas, we will make the ship-yards upon the coast that shall year by year enlarge themselves so that you may rest upon them securely in time of war, for then they can extemporize such a navy as shall be sufficient not only to protect your domestic interests but to bear your flag aloft in triumph in any foreign encounter. But unless you do all this our commerce will continue to decline until it fades into utter insignificance.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman's time has been extended, I trust he will now yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. PIKE. I will.

Mr. MYERS. I do not care to discuss with the gentleman any of the propositions he has set forth. I have been listening for a long time to hear the gentleman speak upon the subject under discussion. Thus far, I presume the House has not been able to agree or to disagree with the gentleman. He has stated most elaborately and most handsomely a number of very good propositions; but I have not been altogether successful in my effort to see what he has been endeavoring to get at. There is, however, one remark of the gentleman which I wish to notice. In expounding one of his propositions he took occasion to say that this Congress had relieved the manufacturing interests—"the rich manufacturers of the country." I merely desire to say that I am here as a representative of the people, not of any special class of the community. I am in favor of imposing taxes where taxes should be imposed, and in favor of relieving taxes where relief should be given, no matter what branch of industry or what section of the country may be affected. We have relieved manufactures from taxation; but doing this, we can yet be in favor of the commercial interests of the country. In my own city there is, I know, much regret on account of the decline of commerce there; but while seeking to promote commerce we are not to refrain from giving relief in other directions.

My chief objection was to the manner in which the gentleman from Maine stated his proposition. Let me say to him that since the passage of the act taking off what is commonly known as "the five per cent. tax" a single manufacturing firm in my district had added two hundred to the men employed by it. So it will be with manufacturing establishments all over the country. I think it should not be assumed that our minds are so narrow, our capacities so limited, that we cannot legislate on all subjects coming before us. Thus far I have voted with the gentleman from Maine, and if he ever comes to a point I may vote with him again; and this much, sir, I have desired to say in justice to myself.

When I said that the gentleman was afraid to allow me to interrupt him I meant simply what the words imported, that is, that he seemed to be afraid of discussion. I am sure, from the gentleman's general good nature and from his pronounced ability, that he is not afraid of discussion, and I am glad that at last he has given me a moment of time to again say that I do not like the kind of assertion that he has made in his argument. His speech would have been a good one without it, and for one I was not willing to sit still and have it go to the country that our action was to relieve the rich at the expense of the poor. His case may be a good one, and I may vote for it, but I take exception to his assertion in respect to our action, the accuracy of which I utterly deny.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to say only one word in reply. In the heat of the moment I made a reply to the gentleman which I hope will not go into the Globe. I have had the most kindly relations with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I do not wish them broken. I apologize for the remark and beg pardon of the House for having used any expression which was not strictly proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. I am glad of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to antagonize the great shipping and commercial interests of the country with our great manufacturing interests, and I hope the gentlemen who particularly represent the manufacturing interests of the country will not consider me as wishing to do it. The remark I made was in relation to rich manufacturers. I am aware that there are poor manufacturers who also have been benefited by the abolition of the tax. I voted for the removal of the tax, and I do not wish to take that vote back or in any way to bring our great interests into conflict. I hope that the manufacturing interests, whose protection has been coeval with the Government itself, will now, in the plenitude of their power and affluence, aid to lighten the load which presses so heavily upon the shipping interests.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I am one who has identified himself somewhat with the manufacturing interests of the country.

Mr. PIKE. I am trespassing upon the time of the House myself, but I will yield to the gentleman, if there be no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Maine suggested that he did not desire to antagonize the great interest he is representing with that of manufactures. I wish, as one who has identified himself somewhat with the manufacturing interest, to say that I indorse most heartily the great idea of his speech, and that I hope this Congress will not rise until it has repealed the tax upon the tonnage of the country carrying between home ports and adopted some of the wise provisions given to the English law by the Yankee boy who, having graduated in Harvard's first class, is known in history as Sir George Downing, the author of the navigation act and the wise promoter of the commercial navy of England. There is, and there can be, no controversy between commerce and manufacture in a well-governed nation. In such a country they are, like loving sisters, handmaiden to each other. That State which creates its commerce by developing its resources and promoting its manufactures may maintain its commercial rank eternally, if it endure forever; but the State which, having achieved commercial greatness or supremacy, sacrifices, as England is now doing, its mines and its manufactures to its carrying trade, must illustrate history's inevitable law that a nation lives by the products of its land yielded to the labor of its people and not by trade alone. In so far only I meant to qualify the gentleman's remarks, but not otherwise to dissent from them.

Mr. PILE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Maine is now speaking with the consent of the House, his time having been extended to enable him to finish his speech. I do not object to his yielding to the gentleman from Missouri, but I will to his yielding further. I make the point he cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the same opinion. The extension was simply given to the gentleman from Maine to close his remarks.

Mr. PILE. I only desire to say, with the permission of the House, that I did not understand the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] in saying that he had changed his opinion on the subject of the tariff, to mean that he was in favor of free trade, but only that he had changed his opinion as to the propriety of the very high prohibitory tariff that was generally advocated in New England some years ago. And, in welcoming the gentleman to the western platform on the subject of the tariff, I do not wish to be understood as indorsing the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that the West is in favor of free trade. As I understand the sentiment of the West, at least that portion that I represent, they are in favor of reasonable protection to our manufacturing interests and a tariff for revenue, and are not in favor of a "high prohibitory duty," oppressive to the consumer and enriching the producer.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PIKE. I hope that all discussion of this resolution will be ended now.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] having made the point of order at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE,] the Chair rules that debate has closed.

Mr. HARDING. I hope that the debate will not be all ex parte.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted.

*The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

The amendment of Mr. SPALDING was reported, as follows:

Strike out the concluding words and insert the words "including in existing treaties;" so that the resolution will read:

That the President be requested to send a sufficient number of vessels of war to the fishing grounds in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, adjacent to the British Provinces, for the purpose of protecting American vessels in the exercise of their rights as indicated in existing treaties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PIKE. I move the previous question on the passage.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 39, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Butler, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Donnelly, Eln, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Getz, Halsey, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Benjamin, Blair, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cullom, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Harding, Hopkins, Humphrey, Hunter, Judd, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, McCormick, Morgan, Newcomb, Nunn, Orth, Ross, Scofield, Shanks, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, William Williams, James F. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel W. Trimble, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—58.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSE FROM SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be relieved from service on the special committee of investigation of charges against the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.] My duties on the Committee of Ways and Means render it utterly impossible to devote any time to any other committee. The Committee of Ways and Means are in session during the entire day.

No objection being made, the gentleman was accordingly excused from service.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to offer a resolution which I believe the Chair will rule to be in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order unless it is a question of privilege.

Mr. ROBINSON. I present it as a question of privilege connected with the impeachment.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution will be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted by this House on the 24th day of February, 1868, in the following words, to wit:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office—

Be, and the same hereby is ordered to be expunged from the Journals of the House, because the passage of said resolution was strictly a party measure, of evil example, and was adopted at a time and under circumstances to endanger the political rights and to injure the pecuniary interests of the people of the United States, and that the Secretary of the House, at such time as the House may appoint, shall bring the manuscript Journal of the session of 1867-68 into the House, and in the presence of the House, draw black lines round the said resolution and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words, "Expunged by order of the House this day of _____, in the year of our Lord 186—."

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, with a fac simile of said impeachment resolution so expunged thereon, be engrossed and framed, and a copy thereof presented to Andrew Johnson, and to each of his living lineal descendants, and also one copy to each public library or reading room in the United States.

[Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. This is not, in the opinion of the Chair, a question of privilege. In the first place, it directs "the Secretary of the House," and there is no such officer. But it is not a question of privilege even if it were correctly drafted. The Journal of each day is read and approved, or else by unanimous consent it is received, which is the same as if it had been approved. This resolution proposes to amend the Journal. It is not a privileged question, for the privilege to amend the Journal ceases with the expiration of the day after the Journal is made up. It can be done by suspending the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON. Allow me to suggest that I meant the "Clerk" instead of the "Secretary."

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that even if the resolution were correctly drafted it would not be a question of privilege. It is a resolution which the House might adopt if it saw fit to do so when regularly in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall bring it up again, and it will be adopted either by this House or in the next Congress. It is a mere matter of time.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 370) to prevent the further sale of the public lands of the United States except as provided for in the preemption and homestead laws, and the laws for disposing of town sites and mineral lands, upon which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DRIGGS. I yield for a few moments to gentlemen who desire to introduce bills and resolutions.

Mr. RANDALL. Can the gentleman yield for any business except what is in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can yield, but unanimous consent has to be asked.

Mr. DRIGGS. I cannot yield for anything that gives rise to debate.

IRRIGATION, ETC., OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. DODGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to furnish this House with copies of the correspondence he has opened with a view to procure information as to the most approved method of irrigation, and also to obtain data illustrative of the natural history and industrial and commercial capacities of the public lands.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That resolution should be addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, I apprehend.

The SPEAKER. It should be.

Mr. DODGE. I will modify it in that way. The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

PHILADELPHIA AND EUROPEAN STEAMLINE.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1040) to provide for an American line of mail and passenger steamships between Philadelphia and one or more European ports; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which this bill was referred; and I move, also, to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CROSS-LEDGE LIGHT-HOUSE.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have been instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports of the Light-House Board, relative to the erection of a permanent light-house at Cross-Ledge shoal, in Delaware bay, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

ORRVILLE AND VIRGINIA CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, asking aid to build a railroad from Orville, in California, to Virginia City, in the State of Nevada; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SAN DIEGO AND GILA RAILROAD.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, asking aid to build a railroad from San Diego, in California, to the Gila river; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

WAGON-ROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, asking Congress to donate lands to build wagon-roads in the counties of Humboldt and Trinity, in California; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, also presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, asking Government aid to construct the Southern Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

WATCHMEN FOR PUBLIC GROUNDS, ETC.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for organizing under the engineer department, instead of any and all laws now authorizing the employment of watchmen for public buildings and grounds, a corps of fifty, more or less, as may be necessary, maimed, wounded, or disabled Union soldiers of the late war, who have been honorably discharged from the military service, who shall act as watchmen in the grounds of the Capitol, Executive Mansion, Smithsonian Institute, Botanic Garden, Agricultural Department, Washington monument, La Fayette square, Franklin square, Lincoln square, Circle, and such other grounds and buildings as need protection.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. It proposes an additional expenditure.

WALLA-WALLA AND COLUMBIA RAILROAD.

Mr. FLANDERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1041) granting the right of way to the Walla-Walla and Columbia River Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FLANDERS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to amend the motion so as to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. FLANDERS. This bill does not call for a grant of public lands, only for the right of way through the public lands. There is no donation of land asked for by the bill.

Mr. JULIAN. The principle is the same.

Mr. FLANDERS. There is one other matter embraced in the bill, else I would not object to its going to the Committee on the Public Lands. This bill asks that the county commissioners of the county of Walla-Walla be authorized to subscribe a certain amount of stock in that railroad. The Legislature of the Territory does not meet again for two years; and as the county of Walla-Walla proposes to take a certain amount of stock in that road, and cannot do it under any law now existing, although the company is incorporated, they ask Congress to authorize the county commissioners to subscribe a certain amount of stock toward building the road. For that reason, and that only, I ask that the bill may go to the Committee on the Territories. There is no land asked for by the bill except a strip fifty or a hundred feet wide for the right of way, and that does not pass over the public lands for more than five miles.

Mr. JULIAN. I will withdraw my amendment.

The motion to refer to the Committee on the Territories was then agreed to.

Mr. FLANDERS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1042) to aid in the construction of a railroad from Walla-Walla to the Columbia river; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FLANDERS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to amend so as to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. FLANDERS. I would prefer that the bill should go to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. It properly belongs there, and I hope the House will so refer it.

The amendment of Mr. JULIAN was agreed to, and the motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. FLANDERS. I move that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the various votes referring bills, &c., be reconsidered; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROADS IN MARYLAND.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1043) to establish certain post roads in Howard, Anne Arundel, and Calvert counties, in the State of Maryland; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Messrs. JENCKES and POMEROY to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Messrs. BANKS and GRISWOLD upon the committee to investigate charges against Mr. DONNELLY.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resumed as the regular order the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 370) to prevent the further sale of the public lands of the United States except as provided for in the preemption and homestead laws and the laws for disposing of town sites and mineral lands, on which Mr. DRIGGS was entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it is expected that this subject will occupy the rest of the day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is apprised of five gentlemen who desire to speak upon it, but is not aware what course the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] who has charge of the bill, has determined upon.

Mr. JULIAN. I will say that there is no probability that the discussion upon this bill will be closed to-day.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is simply a proposition in substance to withdraw from sale all the public lands of the United States. If my health will permit I propose to discuss this subject and to show why its provisions should not extend to the lumber and mineral regions of the country. Representing, as I do, a very extensive and comparatively new district, with hundreds of miles of forests of pine and other valuable timber, and my constituents being largely engaged in manufacturing lumber, I feel it a duty to them that I should state to the House the reasons why I think this bill ought not to pass, at least without an amendment or provision excepting northern Michigan from the effects of its operations.

It is simply a proposition to prevent any further cash sales of the public domain, but leaving the lands as formerly subject to entry by land warrants, land scrip, and under the homestead and preemption laws. These laws were resigned by Congress to secure "homes for the homeless and lands for the landless;" and they doubtless have, and will continue to fill, the good intentions of their authors in the agricultural sections of the country. But I can assure the members of this House that they do not work so well in the timber regions. The homestead law grants a patent after an occupancy of, or residence upon, the land of five years, or allows the occupant to pay for the land after a residence upon it of six months, and making proof as to improvements. This law also provides that an absence from the land of over six months at any one time shall work a forfeiture. Now, it frequently happens that persons who wish to secure one hundred and sixty acres, valuable only for timber, will enter the same, pay the ten dollars to Government, and two dollars fees, making twelve dollars, then leave the land for six months till the lumbering season comes on, when they will either remove the timber or sell it to other parties who will do it, and then abandon the land. It is true the law does not allow them to do this, or to cut or use any more timber than is necessary to fence, erect buildings, and improve the land, until the expiration of the five years; but in those distant, wild forests it is next to impossible to prevent it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will go as far as any gentleman in this House to protect the public domain from the hands of the grasping speculator and land monopolist, and to preserve it forever for the poor landless emigrant, or citizen who wants to secure a home, and who, in good faith, desires to live on and improve the lands he enters; but, while I would do this, I would be very careful not to ruin the vast lumber interest of the country, and not to open the door wider for the commission of the frauds to which I have alluded, by having the prohibitory provisions of this bill applied to the timber regions of the country. If it is done, I would like any gentleman to tell me how the lumberman, who does not own large bodies of pine, is to obtain the logs for his mill? It need not be replied that he can still enter lands for that purpose with agricultural college scrip, for let me tell the gentleman who urges the passage of this bill, that every foot of the one million acres allowed by that act to be located in my State was taken up with this scrip as early as last June. If the bill passes, as before stated, land warrants will be bought up, and placed beyond the reach of many. The homestead settler cannot sell the pine on his location until he has resided upon it for five years; unless, under strong inducements, he does so in violation of the very law under which he holds his title.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I again ask where is the lumberman to obtain a supply of logs for his mill who does not own the land in sufficient quantities? He cannot do it at all; and hence he will be compelled to abandon the business to the large operators who own extensive bodies of pine, giving them the entire control of the market; and, as the lands they possess will thus be enhanced in value three or four hundred per cent., so will the price of lumber be increased from its present price to one hundred dollars per thousand to the consumer all over the country.

The House should look well to it, that in yielding to the popular cry of "Lands for the landless," it does not strike down the indispensable lumber interests and productions of the country and enhance the price of lumber one or two hundred per cent. to every man in the country who wants to build a house, barn, or fence. Not in all cases, but as a general rule, I believe it is true that a man in the northern States who has not the industry, economy and thrift to save money enough to pay the Government $100 for a farm of eighty acres, will not improve, work, and keep one up if it is given to him free.

Mr. Speaker, by a careful collection of lumber statistics in the State of Michigan, it is ascertained that twelve hundred million feet of pine lumber is manufactured annually from the forests of that State, and more than one half of this enormous aggregate from my district. This, at the low average of fourteen dollars per thousand, produces annually $16,800,000; and it is below the mark to place the receipts for staves and other lumber and timber, at $3,200,000, making the total yearly value of manufactured lumber in Michigan $23,000,000. It is a good average of pine lands which produces five million feet of lumber to the thousand acres, hence it takes over two hundred thousand acres of such lands to supply logs for the cut of the mills each year. One of these mills on the Saginaw river, owned by Messrs. Sage & McGraw, cut and manufactured in a single day of twelve hours, last summer, three hundred and seventy-six thousand feet; and during the season, I am informed, some twenty-five million feet were produced, requiring five thousand acres to supply a single mill for a single year with logs. Many other firms in the State are about as large as the one I have cited; and some of these mills with the docks, booms, and expenditures for clearing streams for running logs, teams, and camp equipage, have required an investment in cash of over a quarter of a million dollars, exclusive of the costs of the lands, vessels, and barges, to freight the lumber to market when manufactured.

These mills are built and this vast interest carried on on rivers and streams penetrating the wild forests of the interior, along a lake coast of a thousand miles, where there are no roads or means of access except those made by the enterprising lumberman; where no agriculturist would have ventured for years to come but for the advances of these pioneers of the forest, whose operations have been followed by permanent occupants of the soil.

These men do not buy the lands to withhold them from the seller; they only want the timber. They give employment to thousands of men at good wages, who frequently go into the lumber camp with their teams, their axes, and saws, to earn money enough to buy eighty or one hundred and sixty acres of land for a farm. The lumberman is anxious to and does sell to his hands at prices very often below that which he paid to the Government; and in this way has the settlement and permanent occupation of the soil followed the lumbermen twenty years in advance of sections where they have not been. Pass this bill, Mr. Speaker, and those who have the means—as before stated—will buy up land warrants and scrip, the only considerations that can be given in exchange for land, and hold them until they obtain any price they see fit to ask. In this way large fortunes will be made out of the lumberman of small means, who must purchase small lots to keep his mill running or surrender to his more fortunate neighbor, whose wealth enabled him to own his thirty, forty, or fifty thousand acres. This is the way the bill will work in the lumber sections of the country, and thus will it work injury to all, both producer and consumer.

It requires but little sagacity to see that the effect will be not only to close out these small operators, but to increase the value of these lands now owned by the heavy lumbermen two or three hundred per cent., giving them a perfect monopoly of the business, and increasing the price of lumber to the consumer to an equal extent. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will prevent those wealthy men who desire from securing land in large quantities for speculation and to hold out of market, for there is said to be still afloat twenty millions of representative acres of warrants and scrip of various kinds, and it will be readily seen that they will be used instead of cash for entering land. This is the way it has been done in the past, and I do not believe a more unfortunate and ruinous grant of public land was ever made than the agricultural college grant. This scrip, covering a vast amount of the public domain, has been bought up by speculators at prices from one dollar down to as low as thirty-seven and a half cents per acre. I know of one instance where the whole allowance to a State of three hundred thousand acres was offered at the last-named price, and land warrants have been offered and sold nearly as low as scrip.

This is the way, Mr. Speaker, land monopolies have grown up, and not by cash purchases from the Government. How, let me ask, is the expense of United States land surveys and the entire expense of millions for carrying on the United States Land Office to be met if you prevent any further cash sales, the only source from which money has been derived in the past for this purpose. In the present condition of the national finances is it right to add another million or two to the taxes, when any man who desires can buy a farm for one hundred dollars cash, or enter one under the homestead law for twelve dollars? Cheap enough, one would suppose, to satisfy even the most earnest advocate of "lands for the landless." When this bill was brought up in the committee an amendment was added "excepting regions mainly valuable for pine." Without this the gentleman could not have received permission to report the bill to the House. But, being opposed to the proposition with or without the amendment, I, and those on the committee agreeing with me, consented to have the naked proposition submitted to the House, reserving, however, the right to add the amendment thus agreed upon in committee. In the House, if the bill should be likely to pass, I therefore shall offer the amendment to the bill, and hope the House will not force a measure of such ruinous tendencies upon my State without infracting this amendment upon it.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have only discussed the proposition as it affects my State and the great lumber districts of the country, but I have no doubt the same reasons given why it should not apply to these localities will apply with equal force to the mineral lands. Neither the lumber or mineral lands will ever be entered to any extent for agriculture under the homestead law until the advances of the miner and lumberman have prepared the way and rendered it advantageous to do so. In the copper regions of Lake Superior, where many of the necessities of life are now produced from the soil, especially potatoes, which of the best quality are produced in such quantities as to be exported, not one bushel of wheat, potatoes, or corn would ever have been raised, or one plow or spade have entered the soil, but for the sale to, and the operations of, the men engaged in the iron and copper mining business. There are now nearly forty thousand inhabitants in the upper peninsula of Michigan, where the soil would never have been touched by the agriculturist only on account of the mining interests. I have before me a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he states that there are about one billion four hundred and fourteen million five hundred and sixty-seven thousand five hundred and seventy-four acres of public lands in the United States unsold and unreserved or appropriated. This makes two million three hundred and sixty-six thousand five hundred and eleven sections of six hundred and forty acres each. Allowing one hundred and sixty acres to each preemption and four persons to each family, it will require a population to take up and occupy these lands under this bill of thirty-seven million eight hundred and sixty-four thousand one hundred and seventy-six. And if the same ratio of inhabitants shall become agriculturists in the future as in the past, it will require two hundred million inhabitants and two hundred years to settle this vast area of land.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any necessity for the passage of this bill, nor do I think it would prevent those who wish from accumulating large bodies of land. The Government must, of course, respect the warrants and scrip already issued, but no more should ever be granted, and no more appropriations of land should be made except for public improvements. And such grants should be made of lands near the improvements, with provisions compelling the grantees to keep the lands in market at reasonable rates.

Much opposition has been manifested to railroad grants on the ground that they tend to monopolies, and perhaps this may have been true to some extent; but, after all, they have been of more real benefit to the people than any other grants ever made; and if the provision I have spoken of, requiring the lands to be kept in market at a fair price, be made a condition in future grants of this kind, no evil but much good will result from a similar policy in the future. This bill proposes to change the long-established land policy of the Government, and to prevent it in the future from ever receiving any pay for one foot of land, not even for the expense of conveying title. Every paper in northern Michigan except one, so far as I have heard, is opposed to this bill; and only those who own large bodies of timbered land and those who own land warrants and scrip, and another class who expect to enter and sell the timber without improving the land, are in favor of its passage. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read one or two notices from the press of Michigan, showing how the people of that State feel on the subject. The first is from the pen of Hon. D. W. C. Leach, a former member of Congress, and now editor of the Grand Traverse Herald, and the other from the Detroit Post.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A NEW LAND POLICY.—Under the above head we last week published an extract from the Washington correspondence of the Detroit Post relative to a radical change in the land policy of the General Government. It was stated that Mr. JULIAN has been pressing upon the attention of the Committee on Public Lands, of which he is chairman, a bill that provides for the withdrawal from sale of every acre of Government land in the United States, and that the same shall be open to occupancy and settlement under the homestead and preemption laws."

"From our earliest acquaintance with political affairs we have been classed with Radicals. We have always favored preemption laws, homestead laws, exemption laws, and all other laws that were designed to protect the interests of the laboring classes, and to secure to them homes of which no man, under any circumstances, could dispossess them. But with all our radicalism we are not prepared to indorse the proposed change in the land policy of the Government. We oppose it because we believe it will fail to accomplish any good results whatever."

"We believe it would prove detrimental to the country generally, and especially to the poorer classes in whose behalf it is offered. Without going into an argument to prove this, let us suppose a case."

"The proposed bill becomes a law. No more land is to be sold. No man can for himself and minor children secure more than one hundred and sixty acres. And that he is obliged to take under the homestead law, and remain on it five years before he can become the owner of it. But as the land costs nothing multitudes rush thoughtlessly into the forest and secure their homesteads. Soon a large settlement is formed. Roads become a necessity, but their lands cannot be taxed to build them. Nothing can be done except by voluntary contribution. A school-house is needed; no tax can be levied to build it. A township government is organized, but it can raise no funds to pay its officers. They must serve for nothing or not at all. Several towns are settled and a county organized. It is even in a worse situation than the townships. No taxes can be levied, no necessary public improvements made. Even under the present homestead law this exemption from taxation is found to be a serious evil, a source, in some towns, of great inconvenience, which a large portion of the homestead settlers would gladly see remedied.

If it is said that under this new policy some system of taxation might be devised, we admit the fact; but, if we are correctly informed, it is not provided for and is not designed to be. If the principle of taxation were incorporated in the bill it would be much less objectionable, and yet we could not favor it.

Multitudes of men—perhaps the land on which they build their houses—may make their improvements. Hence very many of those who take homesteads under the present law "prove up" and pay for the same as soon as they can raise the necessary funds. They do not wait for the five years to expire. They never feel quite at home, never feel quite satisfied with their situation, till they have their final papers from headquarters. Why should these men be prohibited from doing this?

"And, again, why should Mr. A and B, who wish to settle in the new portions of the country, be prohibited from purchasing land for their children, who will soon be old enough to occupy it, and whom they may wish to have near them? Where is the harm in this? Who is wronged thereby?

"A man with some capital would settle, for instance, in the Traverse region. He wants a larger farm than one hundred and sixty acres. And with his energy and capital he would be a valuable citizen. He would give employment to poorer men, and aid largely in developing the country. But the law says, 'No; you shall have no larger farm than your neighbor, who has not so much as a yoke of oxen to aid him in clearing up his land.' There may be wisdom in this, but we do not see it. There are thousands of farmers even in the heavily-timbered regions of the Northwest who have purchased and improved large tracts of land greatly to their own interests and the general benefit of the communities by which they are surrounded, and to the injury of no human being.

"Land monopoly is an evil. We do not deny it. But we would not remedy it by resorting to a greater evil. If the remedy is worse than the disease, better let the disease alone.

"The Government is generous, indeed, when it throws open all its lands to the people and says, 'Select your homes where you will'; but it is neither generous nor just when it says, 'You shall not, under any circumstances, have more than one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain. No matter to how noble a purpose you would devote it, though you would build mills or furnaces, though you would found villages or institutions of learning, you shall have no more land than your neighbor.' Away with all such folly. We trust a Republican Congress will find more important matters to occupy its attention than defining the size of a man's farm or prescribing the kind of buildings he is to erect thereon."

"A NEW LAND POLICY.—Mr. JULIAN, of Indiana, has been pressing upon the attention of the Committee on Public Lands, of which he is chairman, a bill that provides for the withdrawal from sale of every acre of Government land in the United States, and that the same shall be open to occupancy and settlement under the homestead and preemption laws. Under such a law no man could buy an acre of land of the Government, and he could only occupy, for his own use, one hundred and sixty acres. A measure of this kind might not operate unfavorably in the prairie States, but in the lumber and mineral regions it would have a most injurious effect. If one man or a single company could secure but one hundred and sixty acres of pine land in Michigan, and then be compelled to run the chance of getting logs of the actual settlers under the homestead act, not a mill of any size would be built in the State. The supply of logs would be too fickle and uncertain. As a result, the price of lumber would be enormously increased, and those who have pine lands enough already would reap a rich harvest. This result would be inevitable under Mr. JULIAN's bill. And in the iron mining region the result would be the same. Large iron works cannot be erected by a company unless a sufficient tract of land can be secured to furnish wood and charcoal for a series of years. If only one hundred and sixty acres could be got hold of, and no title obtained to that until after several years of occupancy and improvement, this great and important interest would be seriously checked and remain undeveloped for a long time in the new portions of the country. Men, in their devotion to an idea, which may be good enough in itself, are apt to lose sight of other considerations equally important to the welfare, progress, and prosperity of the country in all its varied interests. There is no congressional district in the Union so deeply interested in this question as the one Mr. DRIGGS represents; and Mr. FERRY's, perhaps, comes next."

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, with the consent of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DRIGGS,] that both those articles just read proceed upon a misstatement of facts, which I desire to correct. The bill before the House recognizes both the homestead and the preemption laws of the United States, and under the latter any man can, if he chooses to avail himself of its provisions, acquire three hundred and twenty acres of land. All that is said in those articles as to the restriction to one hundred and sixty acres is misapplied as an argument.

Mr. DRIGGS. A man can take the quantity named by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] provided he can get it in adjoining sections, not otherwise; and very frequently this cannot be done.

Mr. Speaker, the articles just read by the Clerk express the almost universal sentiment of the people in the timber sections of the country. In mineral regions they require a large amount of wood for blast furnaces and smelting works, and as the timber is small and very little hard wood grows in that high northern latitude of Lake Superior, thousands of acres are required every year to furnish a supply for these purposes. Besides this, the land is of volcanic formation and rocky where not composed of sand deposits, and hence generally unfitted for agriculture. But if every acre was good farming land and should all be entered under the homestead law, not one cord of the wood could be removed and sold by the preceptor until the expiration of five years from the date of entry, as that law does not allow any timber to be cut and removed until final patents are granted. In some cases it would no doubt be done, but it would be in violation of law, and I do not believe the law would be thus violated in a sufficient number of instances to furnish the wood from thousands of acres of land, annually, for the production of the iron and copper of Lake Superior. If it would be it is quite questionable, in my mind, whether Congress ought to pass laws designed or inevitably tending to produce such results.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has, by refusing to adequately protect the copper interest of this country against foreign competition, ruined this great national product and brought starvation to the very doors of hundreds of the miners of Lake Superior. The last papers from that distant part of my district bring the sad news of the closing up of several of the principal stamp mills, throwing hundreds of men out of employment, who, in the dead of winter, are entirely destitute of means to supply their families with the necessities of life. These men, under the strong demands of nature, have threatened to sack the stores of Houghton and Hancock, and have only been prevented by the kind liberality of the citizens, who, by subscriptions and short employment, at reduced wages, have kept their families from starving. Yet, instead of passing measures for the relief of this and other important American products by suitable duties on foreign importations, all kinds of schemes are devised and bills introduced to further cripple and embarrass them.

There is no necessity for the passage of this bill; every foot of the public lands are open to the operation of the homestead law now, and any one who desires can enter lands under it; then why should Congress prevent by law any who desire from buying land and paying for it, instead of waiting five years for a title, as they are required to do under the homestead law. There is no necessity for it, unless it exists in a desire on the part of some gentlemen to be known as the special friends of the poor by the introduction of eight hour labor bills, and bills to secure "homes for the homeless and lands for the landless," when more adequate and munificent laws for that purpose have been passed by Congress, than ever before passed by any Government on the globe; ample enough for all who desire free homes for an hundred years to come. Instead of passing such measures as the eight-hour bill, and the one under consideration, it would be much better to turn our attention to a reduction of the internal revenue taxes; to a proper protection of American industry by an increased duty on competing foreign importations; by rigid economy in all public expenditures, and by recommending to the whole people of the country economy and industry in every position until our national debt is paid. And to that end, for all of us to work in whatever calling we may find ourselves engaged, twelve hours a day, instead of reducing them from ten hours to eight, until, by a reduction of the debt and taxes, we can resume our former ease.

These, Mr. Speaker, are my views in reference to these extraordinary measures introduced in the present extraordinary condition of the country and its finances. The people understand these questions and what we are doing. They know that the receipts from the sale of the public lands keep their taxes down just so much. They want all the resources of the Government to be protected, and Congress not to give away its means of revenue fifty years in advance of any necessity. What they need is to have Congress lighten their burdens of taxation as far as possible and consistent. They want, and will have, protection to American industry against a ruinous foreign competition. Such full and ample protection it is our duty to give them. In conclusion I will say that when the nation is out of debt I for one am willing not only to give away every foot of Government land to the poor who will settle upon and improve it, but if they need it, and we can afford it, I would give them the means to build a house and barn upon the land, and to stock it also; but I do not think we are in a condition to do it now.

Since preparing the estimated value of manufactured lumber in my State for a single year I have received the statistics of lumber published in the Saginaw Enterprise; and by these figures I find that my estimates are entirely too low, there being manufactured about fifteen hundred million feet of pine, instead of twelve hundred millions; and the price has averaged fifteen instead of fourteen dollars per thousand feet, amounting to $22,500,000; the value of staves, shingles, timber, lath, &c., amounting to at least $7,500,000, making the aggregate value of lumber produced in a single year $30,000,000. Now, sir, it has been my purpose to show and to prove to the House that the passage of this bill will go far to strike down this material and vital interest of my State and district; and if gentlemen will keep in view the facts in the case I am confident they will see that I am correct.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] in his remarks the other day, quoted the opinions of several distinguished gentlemen to prove that land monopolies have worked a great injury to the people of England, France, and Germany; and it seemed to be his chief object to prove that there is immediate danger of a similar evil in this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a great mistake. There is no danger at all of such results in this country. As I have shown, there is land enough for two hundred years; and besides this, there can be at present no more speculation in lands than in horses, mules, or any other species of property. Why not? Because, sir, there are so many million acres subject to entry under the homestead law that an extravagant price cannot be demanded or secured for private lands. But I am not opposed to such legislation as is necessary to secure lands for all who desire to cultivate the soil at the lowest price. I do, however, contend that our land policy is ample and liberal in the extreme for all honest poor. Mr. Speaker, next to air and water, there is no gift of God to man as cheap as the public lands of the United States. Why, sir, all the Government demands for any of its broad acres is about the cost of surveys and the expense of giving title; and under the homestead law it only costs twelve dollars for a farm.

The gentleman has now in his possession a bill which has passed the Committee on Public Lands to allow all soldiers who desire to enter lands under the homestead law to do so without paying even the ten dollars to the Government as now required.

Mr. Speaker, much was said by the gentleman about the hardship to the poor man in being compelled to pay $2 50 for the even sections retained by the Government along the line of railroads. The Government makes an appropriation of six or ten alternate odd sections of land through an uninhabited wilderness where no settler would think of locating for fifty years but for the grant and road. The road is built, and settlers flock in and enter all the lands near the reserved sections, and soon begin to complain of the monopoly of the Government and company because the lands, made three or four times more valuable by the grant and building of the road, cannot be still given away under the homestead law as before.

Sir, there is no justice in this complaint, for the complainer can still enter lands under these laws in regions, if he likes, just like the one in question before the road was built.

As well might the Government or a company expend $2 50 in clearing or fencing a farm, and then give it away, as to thus add to its value by roads, and then do the same thing. There is, I repeat, no justice in this! So far as it relates to the strictly agricultural lands of the country, it is not so material whether this bill passes or not; but that it should not apply to the sections of which I have spoken is very material.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of compelling all recipients of land-grants to keep the same in market at fair and reasonable rates, and of the Government holding the reserved even sections open to the operations of the homestead law; and the Committee on Public Lands is now considering such a proposition for submission to the House. I have no doubt it will pass your committee, and I trust it may the House, and be made a condition in all future grants. If this is done, and all of the lands kept in market and open to settlement and cultivation, there can be no necessity for making this radical change in the land policy of the nation.

Sir, as I remarked a short time since, preventing cash sales of lands will not prevent land monopolies. To prove this I give the operations of the United States land office at East Saginaw, Michigan, for the month of February, 1868, furnished by H. C. Ripley, Esq., Register to the Enterprise, a paper published in that city.

It is as follows:

"GOVERNMENT LANDS.—Government land in the following amounts, and in the manner described, were located at the office in this city during the month of February, 1868:

With cash, acres.....	$242 73
Land warrants, 1855 acres.....	2,800 00
Land warrants, 1850 acres.....	40 00
Under homestead act, acres.....	1,840 00
Total.....	$4,922 73

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have the fact, that of about five thousand acres of lands entered at the United States land office, at East Saginaw, in the State of Michigan, in the month of February last, only a little over two hundred acres were entered with cash.

I have no doubt, sir, that a similar state of facts exists, in reference to cash entries, in all of the land districts of the country. This, then, shows more conclusively than any argument can prove that land monopolies have not, and will not occur through cash sales. Why then, Mr. Speaker, I again ask, should this bill pass? I have tried to show that it ought not, and I hope it will not, at least without ingrafting my amendment upon it.

The gentleman from Indiana produces considerable learned authority to show the evil effects of land monopolies in many parts of Europe; but I doubt not members will see that the opinion of those whom he quotes are of little value, and can have no forcible bearing in support of his bill.

If the public domain of the United States covered no larger area than Holland or Long Island, New York, and if the laws of primogeniture applied to this country, and landed estates descended from father to son; if we had not a thousand million acres of forest for a hunting park, or if we had a nobility here who were likely to buy up and hold the public domain for the above purpose, with laws to hang men for poaching or trespassing, then there might be some force and pertinency in these learned opinions. But as these things do not exist in this country, and are not likely to very soon, I think the gentleman's fears and imaginations are groundless.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me earnestly beg of gentlemen to consider well the importance, of this measure to the interest of which I have spoken before they give their votes in support of the bill under consideration. Sir, what weight ought the opinion of these metaphysical European philosophers to have upon questions of which they know nothing, and upon which they are as ignorant as was another European writer on the geography of this country when he described Michigan as being a flourishing city in the State of Detroit. Why, sir, there are a great many philosophers not only in Europe, but in this country also; they put forth many fine-spun theories and write very learnedly on almost every subject, while they know nothing as to the practical matters of fact of which they write. I would rather have the opinion of any intelligent lumberman, miner, or farmer in my State who knows the effect this bill will have upon the prosperity of the country, than that of all the theorists of Europe. I hope their opinions will have little weight, and that the bill will not pass.

Mr. Speaker, I now give notice that I shall, when a suitable opportunity presents, offer the following amendment:

Add to the bill the following proviso:
Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be held and taken as applying exclusively to such lands as are chiefly valuable for agriculture, and not to mineral or such other lands as are mainly valuable for pine and other timber thereon.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. BLAIR.]

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS—AGAIN.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration here, as has already been said, looks to an entire change of the land policy of the Government since it was established. Certainly it will be agreed that this ought not to be done without good reason. The land policy of the country has, so far as we are able to see, been a very successful policy from the beginning. Land has always been cheap, easily acquired by the people of the country, and I believe I may repeat what I had occasion to say once before here, that there is no man in the United States who can be benefited by a farm who has not been able to get it in the wilderness of this country. I do not believe any facts can be shown that will go to controvert this statement.

I ask, then, for what reason shall we now reverse this policy? What reason does the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands [Mr. JULIAN] give us why we should change the entire land policy of the country and forbid hereafter any citizen of the United States from buying a foot of public land if he should wish to? I listened with attention to his speech made now some days ago on this question, and, if I understood him correctly, his whole argument was hinged upon the idea of land monopoly. He told us that we ought to provide lands so they may be had by the "landless poor." Now, I say that if there are any landless poor in the United States it is because they choose to be landless poor. The homestead law is in operation to-day, and it has been in operation for a long series of years. Whoever wishes to seek a home upon the public lands can find it now. The Government offers it freely. I make no quarrel with this policy. On the contrary, I disclaim it and am in favor of the policy; but I will not forbid any man who chooses to buy his farm and take possession of it at once instead of taking it from the Government and waiting for a series of years before he should have possession of it. Why should he do that? It is a characteristic of the American that he likes to own the ground upon which he lives and he likes to own the property upon it. I myself say that it is a most excellent characteristic, and I should be glad to encourage it. While I should give the landless poor his farm in the wilderness if he wishes it, I would not forbid any other man who chooses to buy and own his farm to get it in that way.

I cannot find in the gentleman's argument anything which militates against this, except that in the process of time we shall by and by arrive at a period when there will be no lands for this purpose, and we ought to begin to husband our lands at this time and prevent their sale. My objection to this is that it ties up the public lands and fetters the limbs of enterprise of the American people.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the bill would prevent the actual settler from purchasing any land?

Mr. BLAIR. I have certainly so understood the bill. I cannot conceive of anything the bill will do for anybody if that be not so.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Does not this bill provide that any man may select and acquire land under the preemption law?

Mr. BLAIR. I think the bill allows the preemption act to remain in force. If it does, it contradicts its own theories. Why should a man be allowed to get land under preemption and not be allowed to go and buy it and get his title at once? Why should he be put to the necessity of going upon the land and making a preemption instead of paying for it at once?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I suppose the reason would be this: in one case the preëmptor is an actual settler, and in the other case he may not be.

Mr. BLAIR. Very true, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I do not wish to be understood in what I say as either indorsing or opposing this bill. I am merely in pursuit of information.

Mr. JULIAN. Will the gentleman allow me a single remark? Under the homestead law a settler may commute his settlement into a purchase, and as a matter of course become absolute owner.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, I do not see what is to be gained by this bill. If we are after all to arrive by some process at the same right the citizen has already to purchase the land, then—

Mr. JULIAN. We gain the settlement and tillage of the land.

Mr. BLAIR. But the settler may go right away and take another piece of land, selling his first settlement as soon as he has got the land in his possession.

Mr. JULIAN. Not under the law.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to use all my time.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] to state that a settler cannot enter other lands after he has taken one piece. I understand, on the contrary, that when he has paid for his land at the end of six months he can enter other lands and get his patent.

Mr. JULIAN. No, sir; I understand the land office have ruled otherwise.

Mr. DRIGGS. I know of instances where it has been done.

Mr. BLAIR. I will let the gentlemen settle this dispute among themselves. I was about to say that I am opposed to the whole policy of this bill because it is calculated to fetter the enterprise of the country. Now, if there is any one thing which we have found to develop the resources of the country and add to its greatness it has been the fact that the people are free. As I have already remarked, an American does not wish to have anything that he cannot sell. He is more or less a migratory person. When he seeks to buy a farm he is not willing to get one that he cannot sell or trade away. Now, it has been the policy of our Government to allow the people entire liberty in all things, and I do insist that the same policy ought to be pursued in regard to the public lands. We should allow the people to take up homesteads as they choose and encourage them to go and settle on the public lands.

And now, as to the question of monopoly of the public lands, I undertake to say that there is no monopoly of those lands to-day that Congress itself is not entirely responsible for. That statement is not so broad but that the facts will bear me out in it.

If gentlemen will cast their eyes over the country and see who are the owners of the vast tracts of land, whether as corporations or individuals, they will find that they have become owners under congressional grants for railroad and other purposes. And all experience has proved that allowing the citizen to trade in the public lands, to buy and sell them as he chooses, does not cause monopoly. On the contrary, it destroys monopoly. There never was anything like as much danger of monopoly in the public lands as there is of monopoly in corn and the food of the people. Have we not seen, over and over again, a few rich people raising the price of food, the very life of the people? They frequently do it by combining together to purchase and hold it in large quantities. But this has not been the case with the public lands. It cannot be done with them, because the quantity is altogether too great for the accomplishment of any such purpose.

And then, again, whoever wishes to buy public land will buy it for the purpose of selling again. No man buys public land to hoard it. Sometimes, indeed, it is purchased with a view to hold it for a time; but in the main, those who go on the public lands go there to cultivate them, and it is for the benefit of the country. And it will be found that no new country under the sun ever developed as the United States has done. What is the reason? Because the lands are free and the people are free. They buy land, and when they own it they sell it as they choose. It is like horses and cattle; or, as my friend has well said, it is like grain and cotton. They sell and buy it when they like.

And this, I think, is an answer to all that the chairman of the committee has said, or rather quoted from the publicists in foreign countries. The difficulty there is that the lands are entailed. If you will just simply destroy the law of primogeniture in England, it shall break up the entire land monopoly in that country in fifty years; as soon as a generation dies the land will all be divided as the great estates fall to the various heirs of the families that own them.

I repeat again, and I stand upon that ground here, that in this matter, as in all others, it is best to leave the people of the country to take care of themselves and let them buy land if they want to, keeping the benefits of both systems together. We not only have the benefits of the homestead system now, but we have the benefits of the other system along with it. They do not interfere with each other.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I think it proper in considering the bill now before the House to ascertain what has been the past history of the legislation of our country in reference to its public lands.

When the founders of our Government raised the banner of revolt and sought a separate existence among the nations of the earth, one of the counts in their immortal indictment of George III, the Declaration of Independence, read as follows:

"He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States, for that purpose obstructing the laws for the naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their immigration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of land."

The great men who founded the Government perceived clearly that the land of a country was the true foundation of all its prosperity, and that it was of the utmost importance that the soil should pass as speedily as possible into the possession and ownership of the actual cultivators.

They perceived that the growth of the Colonies was due in a great degree to the cheapness and abundance of the land within their limits. Thomas H. Benton, in a speech made in the United States Senate in 1828, said:

"Provinces which now form sovereign States were sold from hand to hand for a less sum than the Federal Government now demands for an area of two miles square. The State of Maine was sold by Sir Fernando Gorges to the proprietors of the Massachusetts Bay for twelve hundred pounds provincial money."

In many of the original colonies along the Atlantic coast the public lands were literally given away, the only price in most cases being the payment of "a penny" or a "peppercorn."

Those States which, after the Revolution, possessed in their own right large tracts of unsettled territory, pursued a like liberal policy; and the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and ten millions of acres in the State of Ohio were under these State laws either donated outright to actual settlers, or given to them under homestead or preemption laws, or sold at two cents per acre.

Unfortunately, however, the General Government was at first neither so wise nor so liberal. It forgot that the settlement of the country was due, in the main, to poor men settling upon lands virtually given to them; it forgot that with enormous tracts of unsettled country its first duty was to encourage immigration and settlement; its sole thought was to derive revenue from the sale of the public lands.

That great man, Edmund Burke, had said, in the English House of Commons, in 1785:

"The principal revenue which I propose to draw from these uncultivated wastes is to spring from the improvement and population of the kingdom; events infinitely more advantageous to the revenues of the Crown than the rents of the best landed estates which it can hold. It is thus I would dispose of the unprofitable landed estates of the Crown; throw them into the mass of private property, by which they will come, through the course of circulation, and through the political secretions of the State, into well regulated revenue."

But the Government of the United States was not at first prepared to adopt the wise and liberal views of Mr. Burke. It was determined to wring revenue and direct revenue from the public lands without regard to their settlement. Hence they proscribed settlement; the settler was "stigmatized as a trespasser and repulsed as a criminal," and the lands were exposed at public sale and sold to the highest bidder, excepting the salt lands and lead mines, which were retained by the Government and rented out on the most advantageous terms to private persons.

Slowly, gradually, the broad principle enunciated by Mr. Burke came to be more generally recognized. The legislators of the country began to perceive that the settlement and cultivation of the country were essential to the prosperity of the people, and the light slowly dawned upon them that the prosperity of the people was identical with the prosperity of the nation.

In this protracted struggle of just views against erroneous opinions the country was greatly indebted to the labors of Hon. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, and to the clear head and liberal heart of Andrew Jackson, President of the United States. President Jackson in 1832, in his message to Congress, announced his conviction that as soon as the revolutionary debt was paid (to the payment of which the public lands were pledged) "they should cease to be a subject of revenue, and be disposed of chiefly with a view to settlement and cultivation."

The history of the land legislation of the United States is a history of the gradual approximation of the laws of the nation to the wise standard set up by Burke, Benton, and Jackson.

First in order came the preemption laws. I need not enter into the details of these laws; they are familiar to the House; nor need I give the amendments which were from time to time urged and added to the original measure, and which were all more and more in favor of the actual settler.

Then followed for years the struggle to obtain the homestead law. Its principle was founded on "the universal belief" asserted by Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, "that the conquest of a country, the driving out of the savage hordes and still more savage men," cutting down and subduing the forest and encountering all the hardships and vicissitudes necessarily incident to the conversion of the wilderness into cultivated fields, was fully worth the fee-simple of the soil."

Having once asserted, in the language of Jackson, the principle that the public lands "should be disposed of with a view to settlement and cultivation," the logical result was the homestead law.

In the meantime various other measures were adopted in reference to the public lands.

A fixed proportion of the lands in each township was donated by the General Government to the States for the support of public schools. No measure could have been better advised or productive of more beneficial results. I need not at this time enlarge upon the importance of general education under a form of government like our own, where the judgment of the citizen makes the laws and controls the destiny of the nation, and is the ultimate resort on all great questions which agitate the nation. I can conceive of a despotism resting securely upon an ignorant and degraded people; but it seems to me impossible to hope for the continuance of a republic where those who make the laws and control the Government bring neither intelligence nor enlightenment to the task. The beneficial influences of the public schools created or maintained by these grants of land will continue to be felt as long as our race continues to exist.

The grants of land made as bounties for services in the naval and military service of the country resulted in a large degree in contributing to the actual settlement of the country, the warrants in a great number of cases being purchased by preceptors and others in the actual occupancy of the land.

The policy of grants of public land for the support of agricultural colleges in all the States has proved to be a most unjust and calamitous one for the West. It is, in effect, a policy to create and support great institutions in the older and wealthier States by inflicting incalculeable injury upon the newer and poorer portions of the nation. The whole policy was nefarious, and has produced nothing but evils for the West, evils which will be more and more felt as time advances.

We come next to the subject of railroad land grants.

A good deal has been said here on this floor in opposition to grants of public land to aid in the construction of railroads, and it has been assumed that such grants were in some sense a pecuniary injury to the nation and against sound public policy. Nothing could be further from a just conception of the facts. The Government has in every case retained the alternate sections in the grant, and the construction of the road has everywhere doubled their price; so that it has received as much for the one half retained as it would have received for the whole area without a railroad; and no man familiar with the facts can doubt that in just so far as railroads develop and settle a country in so far does the demand for Government land increase.

The chief end and aim of railroad grants should be to furnish transportation for the productions of the actual settler and to induce men to go upon the public lands and occupy and cultivate them. If they are made properly subordinate to this great end they become a public blessing, even while they may be at the same time very properly a private benefit. It is no argument to say that in certain localities land grants have not secured the construction of railroads. If any particular road could not be built with a valuable grant of fertile public lands it follows, as a matter of course, that without such a grant its construction would have been still more impossible.

The importance of the railroad system to the West cannot be overestimated. The grain raised upon land forty miles from a railroad or any great water course is almost valueless save for home consumption, and a people so situated must continue in a poor, primitive, and unprogressive condition. Unable to exchange the surplus productions of their soil for agricultural implements, manufactured goods, or the manifold necessities and luxuries of life, they lapse in a generation or two into a semi-barbarous and wretched condition. Railroads mean to a new country population, commerce, enterprise, prosperity, cultivation, civilization, everything.

I doubt if the railroad system of the United States would to-day have reached the Mississippi river but for the aid afforded by land grants.

But, as I have said before, they are to be recognized by Congress only as aids to the actual settlement of the country, and where they can be reasonably expected to afford that aid they should be fostered and cherished by the General Government. At the same time, I am of the opinion that we should resort to all measures which will tend to lessen the evils which are necessarily incident to such gigantic corporations. The greatest of these evils is the withdrawal of large bodies of public land along the line of the road from settlement. It is believed that this evil can be averted by placing the lands so granted to any future railroad in the hands of the State as trustee for the corporation, with authority to sell the lands to actual settlers at a fixed price and deliver the proceeds of the lands to the railroad company. In this manner the State will sell the land instead of the company, and the sale will be made to actual settlers and not to non-resident speculators. The company will receive all it could reasonably expect, while the settlement of the country will not be for one moment interrupted. In this manner it is in the power of the Government to aid these great lines of intercommunication, assist the settlement of the country, and afford at a reasonable rate homes for thousands of industrious and deserving people. A bill is now pending before the Committee on Public Lands of the House which proposes to apply this principle to all future grants of public lands to railroad corporations. This bill will, I trust, become a law. Should it be enacted it will remove, I think, the one great objection to railroad land grants. With such a law upon our statute-books we could afford to give railroad grants whenever reasonably demanded, for they would not for one moment interrupt the settlement of the country; the conversion of the land into farms and the construction of the railroad would proceed side by side; the farms would furnish business for the road, the road would furnish an outlet for the productions of the farms. Thus commerce and agriculture would meet on equal terms and mutually assist each other. It is in this marriage of the wisdom of legislation with the wants and necessities of the people that the highest statesmanship will be found to exist.

I come at length to the great crowning measure of all, the homestead law.

The preëmption law had grown steadily in scope and importance from its inception, as far back as 1801, down to the year 1841, when it became a permanent part of our system of laws.

The South always resisted the homestead law. The ruling class of the South were opposed to the subdivision of the land in the hands of the many. All their instincts were aristocratic. They desired that condition of things wherein the few should own all the lands and all the laborers. Hence it was not until the great rebellion left the seats of the southern Members and Senators vacant that the Republican party was able to procure the passage of the homestead law. It came at the same time with that other great measure, the Pacific railroad. They were joint assertions of those principles and ideas which are hereafter forever to rule in this nation, and which underlie alike republican institutions and the true prosperity of the human family.

The homestead law proceeds upon the principle that the lands should go to the actual settler without money and without price. It is founded upon the truth enunciated by Hayne, that the subjugation of the wilderness is payment in full of the fee-simple of the land. It is especially in the interest of the actual settlers and against the interest of the non-resident speculators.

Mr. Speaker, the homestead law does not need at my hands any defense.

If there is any one subject which the eye of philanthropy can contemplate with more satisfaction than all others it is the first settlement of a fertile and beautiful country. We there see humanity in its most attractive aspects. The emigrant goes forth with his family, his train of horses and cattle, his household goods, into the new land which lies open before his feet, the richest gift of the Almighty. He passes along by fenced fields and pleasant homes, where but yesterday the wilderness reigned supreme, and he looks forward,

"With all his future in his face," to that coming day when he, too, shall sit under his own roof-tree and look abroad over his own land; when he shall escape forever from the hard and grinding hand of poverty and from

"The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
Which patient merit of the unworthy takes."

When he strikes his plow into the earth it is the virgin earth, pure and sweet from the hands of its great Maker. The air that sweeps around him comes not freighted with the reeks of crowded and pestilential cities, the dreadful haunts of poverty and vice, but it blows from out the lips of heaven with health and beauty on its wings.

The first settler is the corner-stone of all future development; the entire structure of society and government must rest upon the foundation of his labors. His work shall last till doomsday. He first unites the industry of man to the capabilities of the fertile earth. The tide of which he is the forerunning breaker shall never recede—"Ne'er feel returning ebb, but keep due on"—until the wilderness is densely populated; until every foot of land, however intractable, is subdued; until the factories cluster thickly in great knots upon every falling stream; until cities, towns, and villages dot the whole land; until science, art, education, morality, and religion bear the world forward to a development far beyond the farthest ken of the imagination, into that unknown future of the human race which we cannot prefigure even in our dreams.

How many beautiful traits gather around these homes snatched from the wilderness? How many fair women and noble men have seen the first light of heaven through the chinks of the log-house? How many heroes worthy to be embalmed in perpetual history have grown up in the sturdy independence of the forest and the prairie? By the side of such men the denizens of your cities are a dwarfed race. It needs pure air, pure sunshine, pure food, and the great stormy winds of heaven to produce the highest types of the human family, and to give to them that inflexible grain which is the first constituent of great characters.

Consider for one instant the part performed by the people of the West in the suppression of the rebellion. Their share of the great work was well done. Wherever they advanced they overcame the rebellion as they overcame the wilderness; they hewed it down, they outworked it, they chopped it to pieces, they overwhelmed it with energy and industry, they bridged it, they corduroyed it, they blazed and burned it out of existence. The men whom nature in all its hard and stubborn moods could not resist made easy victory over their misguided fellow-citizens fighting for slavery and against liberty and law.

They were types of thousands and tens of thousands of men through all the region from which they came, the great West: quiet, unpretending men, steadfast and earnest, patiently fulfilling the appointed work which God has given them to do. The great thinkers of England grieve that in their island this yeoman class has become extinct—ground to powder between the upper and nether millstones of a gorged and depraved aristocracy and a pauperized laboring class. England's finest scholar, Goldwin Smith, says:

"Those independent yeomanry, with high hearts and convictions of their own, who filled the ranks of the Ironsides, who conquered for English liberty at Marston, Naseby, and Worcester, in their native England, are now seen no more. Here they have left a great, perhaps a fatal gap, in the ranks of freedom. But under Grant and Sherman they still conquer for the good cause."

This nation needs more of such men. We must cherish the institutions which have produced them. Their price is richer than rubies. They are the salt of a nation. Some one said to Croesus when he showed him his treasures: "But if one should come along with more iron he would take all this gold." The prosperity of a people rests upon its manhood; the gold can only repose upon the iron. Without this a nation is but a conglomerate of sordidness and sensuality—a mixture of clay and brass which must fall to pieces the moment a strong hand is laid upon it.

Now, what is the root of all this? It is the pioneer driving his plow for the first time into the surface of the wilderness. The whole structure rests upon the occupancy and ownership of the land by the individual. Hence follow independence, self-respect, and all the incentives to labor; hence industry, intelligence, schools, society, development—not the hot-house development of the towns, but sturdy, healthy development, which has its roots in the earth, which expands in the family circle, and which brings strength and power to the best traits of human nature.

We cannot overrate the importance of the subdivision of the land among the people. Being the original parent of all wealth, its blessing should be wide-spread and should reach as many as possible; otherwise it will concentrate in a few hands, and then will follow plethora for the few and pauperism for the many, until at last we realize the pitiful and lamentable condition of Europe, where the blood and tears and sweat of the afflicted cry from the earth like the blood of Abel.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we owe to every man who desires to possess it a reasonable portion of the unoccupied land of the nation. The right inheres in him and it inheres in the great mass of his fellow-men, because he and they are alike to be benefited—he directly, they indirectly. That right the homestead law recognizes and protects.

The history of human government is a history of errors gradually developing into truths. The further back we go in the development of the race the more powerful do we find error, and the fiercer and bloodier are the struggles with which it resists truth. Oceans of blood were necessary to wash out a single wrong; and when one wrong was obliterated the judgments of men moved sluggishly forward, a pace, to coagulate again into some new error.

The first great right struck at by the barbarism of man is the right of the individual to a share of the land. Conquest in the old time meant confiscation of the soil and its absorption into a few hands; hence serfdom, wretchedness, and degradation. Progress now means simply carrying into effect the plain, simple, benevolent rules which God meant for his earth. The earth is for man. As the race cannot exist without the support afforded by the productions of the soil, so the individual man cannot rest with safety upon any basis save his right to a share in that soil.

The great end of government is the improvement of the condition of the individual; and what can more tend to his welfare than a share in the great source of all wealth—the cultivable surface of the earth? For, when we consider it closely, civilization itself rests upon agriculture. The world's wealth has been taken from its bosom. This prolific mother, never wearied, has been giving of her strength and richness to her children through uncounted generations.

The word "Aryan," the name of the parent stock from which all the white races of the world originated, is derived from the root "ar," signifying to plow; because of all the barbarians this race alone, destined to rule the world, tore open the surface of the soil and planted therein the food-producing plants. And it is a striking fact that with this same root "ar" is derived the Latin "ars" or "artis," and our own word "art;" as if philology itself would bear testimony that the cultivation of the soil was the first great art and the parent of all the other arts.

The miner, while he delves into the bowels of the earth, is fed and clothed by the productions of its surface. The fleets which whiten the sea's broad surface are laden with the fruits of the soil. Our cities, our sciences, our luxuries, our learning, all rest upon this one grand basis: the power of the soil to multiply manifold the seed given into its charge.

Any policy, therefore, which sets the plow moving in new lands is a benefit to civilization and to the whole human family. The right to own and occupy the soil belongs, therefore, not alone to the individual who avails himself of it, but it is the right of his fellow-men that he should be able to avail himself of it.

There are two things which cannot be confined to the sources which beget them—good and evil. They are like the expansive gases—they will dilate until reduced to inappreciable quantities. No limit can confine them, no hands can fetter them. Hence when you put a man in the way of doing good you benefit all men around him; when you confine him to evil he gives off evil influences like a pestilence.

Let us reduce this to details.

The wilderness is barren; it is useless, save to the few wild creatures that range over its surface.

Set the plow moving, and the result is wealth. But wealth is only valuable as it is able to communicate and interchange itself with other wealth. Hence the necessity for roads. Where these roads converge there are towns and cities, and these give birth to greater roads, increasing like the veins as you approach the heart of commerce. What next? Believe the primal animal necessities of man and his higher nature comes into play—it begins to dart out and reach at new subjects. It observes, it inquires, it reflects. New wants arise with new knowledge, and these again beget other wants. Give a man wealth, and civilization comes to him clad in a thousand attractive shapes and colors. It is said that the earth taken from the depths of mines, where it has slept for thousands of years, if exposed to the sun's rays will develop all manner of novel and singular plants. So when civilization beams upon the mind of man, it awakens the seeds of a multitude of new wants of which he was before unconscious. Society is the interchange of wants. Whenever you afford man the opportunity to improve his condition you widen the area of civilization. Every bushel of wheat grown is a contribution to the wealth of the world, and, therefore, to the comfort of the human family. Hence we may say that every plow set moving on the plains of the West is felt in its consequences through all the populations of Europe.

And how pitiful, Mr. Speaker, is the condition of those populations? They lie at the base of a column of injustices heaped high above them. How desolate is the cry which their wretchedness, their misery, their very sinfulness, sends up to heaven? How pale, how bloodless are their poor faces as they gather in the fetid alleys of the great cities of the Old World, or sit down patiently to their insufficient food in miserable cabins? The whole past of the human family seems to rest crushingly upon them. Conquests a thousand years old yet press upon their shoulders. The distinctions of race and caste and religion, and all the million forms of injustice growing out of these, yet hold them under their feet. They look to the laws and they are against them; they look to the land and it is occupied; they can only hope by the most cruel and unceasing toil to snatch a living more scant, more precarious than that which the gaunt wolf gathers in the depths of the forest.

What nobler task can we then assign ourselves than to make plain and smooth the path of these poor people to homes in the New World—to lead them out from suffering and want into abundance and prosperity?

Should not, then, the great natural rights of poor men in Europe and this country be protected by the passage of the bill now under consideration? Does not the welfare of the nation itself demand it? Who will be injured by such a measure?

When the speculator purchases large tracts of land in a new country, what is his purpose? He well knows that the wilderness never of itself rises in value. Any increase of value must be given to it by the actual work put upon it by human skill and industry. His purpose, then, is to enrich himself by the work of the poor man who may settle upon land near him. This, then, is capital increasing itself by the unrequited toil of the poor. The poor man struggles against hardships, he builds fences, he builds houses, he supports schools and churches, he creates roads, he establishes towns; and the wealthy speculator, looking on from afar off, quietly derives large profits from all these heroic exertions. Nay, more, he is an impediment to the actual settler. In just such proportion as the actual settler's improved land appreciates the value of the speculator's wild land in just such proportion does the speculator's wild land depreciate the value of the actual settler's improved farm. The non-resident's lands are the spots and blotches left of the original wilderness on the face of the settled country. They are blocks in the path of progress. They decrease the villages; they hinder settlements; they prevent schools and churches; they render population sparse; they are every way an injury and in no sense a benefit.

Let me refer for one instant to my own State. On the east side of the upper Mississippi river large quantities of the public lands fell at an early day into the hands of speculators; on the west side but few speculators secured lands. Mark the result: Stearns county, on the west side, increased from 1860 to 1865 seventy-five per cent., while Benton county on the east side, immediately across the river, decreased over twenty per cent.; Wright county on the west side increased fifty-three and three fourths per cent., while Anoka on the east, immediately across the river, increased only seven per cent.; McLeod on the west side increased ninety-one per cent., while Sherburne, on the east side, increased only thirteen and three fourths per cent. The difference is summed up in this: the east side was cursed with speculators; the west side was blessed with actual settlers.

But it is said that the men who avail themselves of the homestead law are poor men. Be it so. Are they not, therefore, the very men who most need the bounty and aid of a generous Government? No higher testimony could be afforded to the justice and expediency of the measure, than that it helps those who most need help. If it will convert poor, honest, industrious men, with nothing but their brave hearts and willing hands, into a wealthy and prosperous population, it proves itself the very philosopher's stone of legislation. The great Napoleon said that the chief object of his administration was "to drive mendicancy out of France for ever." In that sentence he summed up the true end of Government; because to destroy "mendicancy" it would be necessary to lift up all the grades of society above that grade, and to do this he would have to improve the material condition of all his people. Every poor man relieved from poverty widens the opportunities of every other poor man, and so raises the standard of every member of the community.

I read the other day the history of the Shenandoah valley, and I learned that the aristocracy of that beautiful and fertile region were the descendants of the poor squatters who first won it from the wilderness.

Mr. Benton, in one of his speeches, said:

"I saw, in early life, in Tennessee, that the fortunes and respectability of many families were derived from the six hundred and forty acre head-rights, which the State of North Carolina had bestowed upon the first settlers."

The same statesman, in another speech in the Senate, gave a remarkable instance of this kind in the history of "Granny White," at that time well known to the people of Middle Tennessee. He said:

"At the age of sixty she had been left a widow, in one of the counties in the tide-water region of North Carolina. Her poverty was so great that when she went to the county court to get a couple of little orphan grandchildren bound to her, the justices refused to let her have them, because she could not give security to keep them off the parish. This compelled her to emigrate; and she set off with the two little boys upon a journey of eight or nine hundred miles to what was then called 'the Cumberland settlement.' Arrived in the neighborhood of Nashville a generous-hearted Irishman—his name deserves to be remembered, Thomas McCrory—let her have a corner of his land on her own terms, a nominal price and indefinite credit. It was fifty acres in extent, and comprised the two faces of a pair of confronting hills, whose precipitous declivities lacked a few degrees, and but a few of mathematical perpendicularity. Mr. Benton said he knew it well, for he had seen the old lady's pumpkins propped and supported with stakes to prevent their ponderous weight from tearing up the vine and rolling to the bottom of the hills. There was just room at their base for a road to run between, and not room for a house, for which purpose a part of the hill had to be dug away. Yet, from this hopeless beginning, with the advantage of a little piece of ground that was her own, this aged widow and two little grandchildren of eight or nine years old advanced herself, to comparative wealth: money, slaves, horses, cattle; and her fields extended into the valley below, and her orphan grandchildren were raised up to honor and independence. These were the fruits of economy and industry, and a noble illustration of the advantage of giving land to the poor."

The homestead law needs but one thing more; as it is founded upon the principle that it is more advantageous to the nation for the poor man to occupy the land without price than for the rich absentee to take it at the highest possible price, it is necessary that the principle should be carried out to its logical conclusion, namely: that all the lands capable of cultivation by actual settlers should be given to the actual settlers, and that none should be sold to speculators. And this is the pending bill which we ask to enact into a law.

It is the logical sequence of all that has gone before it in the land legislation of our country. The preemption law and the homestead law both point inevitably in this direction. Having given these rights to the pioneer we must sweep the public lands clear of all impediments, and leave the field open to him alone.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that this measure will be strongly opposed. I am aware that its enactment may be long delayed, but like the preemption law and the homestead law it will eventually triumph.
